On leaving the porch, after dismissing her flock, Margaret found Joseph Tregear and Tom Polglaze pretending to read the inscriptions on the tombs. At the sound of her step Tom raised his head and advanced with a friendly nod, while Joseph remained still, but fixed those great blue eyes on her.

"Good morning, Tom," said she indifferently; "how are you?"

Polglaze was replying as they neared Tregear, when Margaret stopped. Tregear still held back, trembling in his heart and apprehensive of his rival. Margaret, however, was so apparently calm that he was beginning to think her heart as hard as her native rocks, when nodding an adieu to Polglaze, she very naturally and very quietly put her hand on Tregear's arm and said:

I am very sorry I kept you waiting; I can now only spare you half an hour for a walk."

It was the first time she had ever shown a preference, and Polglaze now knew that he too was "left of the race." His face changed to an ashen hue, and he tottered off with dejected looks, but with clenched fists.

Tregear squeezed the small hand that had been so unexpectedly put in his arm, and led Margaret away for the promised walk, which, it need scarcely be said, was unconsciously lengthened into an hour.

When Margaret once more arrived under her parents' roof it was not alone that Tregear was invited to enter. Henceforth, another had also a right to join her there.

Tregear knew the price that must be paid for Margaret's love. He knew that Polglaze would not give her up without a contest. Nor was it long before the battle was commenced, for that very evening, as Tregear was leaving the house of the Powel's he was attacked by his rival. With him it was but a word and a blow.

"Joe Tregear, you've crossed my steps and now I'll be revenged on you!"

So saying, Polglaze struck a blow which would have felled an ordinary man. But Tregear was quite a match for him, and the two fought long and desperately, until separated by the rural policeman, who threatened them with legal proceedings.

Of course Margaret was one of the first to hear of the battle. Distressed beyond measure she went to her lover's parents where she found him in a most unpresentable condition. A few words soon explained the position of affairs, when Margaret burst into tears and blamed herself for showing preference so stupidly

Margaret," replied her lover, "do not take it to heart. I'd rather be fighting him again than to see your tears."

"Let me alone a minute. Let me overcome this."

"Yes, dear heart!" said Mrs. Tregear, don't ye take on in this way. These tinmen are regular visitthers; but this Tom Poglaze is the greatest fighter that ever I see."

"Yes Margaret, that's true. I knew that the day I gained your love I should find an enemy. But cheer up, cheer up! I fancy he will not attack me again in a hurry, for I know he does not at this moment look a bit handsomer than I do."

And so saying he laughed the matter lightly away, until Margaret too began to smile through her tears.

On the following day, when the two rivals went to the mine, their appearance caused many jeering and contemptuous remarks, for the tinmen, were in hopes of goading them to renew the battle. Polglaze had, however, found an adversary worthy of his strong arm, and was not so ready to strike the first blow as he had been the night before. He contented himself, therefore, with doubling his fists and saying that the time of vengeance would come.

Months passed away, however, Tremont recovered from its unwonted excitement, and matters took their usual course. The mines were worked, old seams were used up, and new veins opened out; but, though the battal had not been renewed, Joseph Tregear and Tom Polglaze had not yet shaken hand. This caused Margaret no small anxity, for down there in the bowels of the earth an unseen blow with a pick might destroy the happiness of her life. She often begged Tregear to leave the mines, but he said he had good prospects of being appointed engineer's assistant, and as for Tom Polglaze's threat—why, he had not the slightest anxiety on account of that.

At length a new shaft was to be opened, and the two young men, being the steadiest hands in the mine, were selected for the operation. There they toiled together for a few weeks without exchanging a word, and there they were alone, far from any other workman. Margaret was wretched, but to all her supplications Tregear still said that he had no fear In her distress she spoke to Polglaze and asked him to shake hands with Tregear. He refused, but he pressed his rough hands to his temples and said, "I loved you then, I love you now, as much or more than Joe Tregear."

A day or two after that both men were again at work together, and silent as death in their solitary shaft. They were suddenly startled by a falling stone. A few lumps of earth then came tumbling down, and the whole shaft seemed to tremble.

The works were giving way. The two men looked at one another for a moment with blanched faces. It was the first time they had looked into one another's eyes since that fatal day, except to dart fatal glances of scorn and hate. They ran to the kebble and gave the signal to be drawn up. They were touching one another now, their hands almost clasped together on the rope. Their very breath seemed to intermingle. It was terrible after such a course of hate to be brought together under such circumstances. As they were both shouting to be drawn up the rope tightened and strained, but the kebble would not move. More earth now fell, but still the kebble remained at the bottom of the shaft. Whilst shouting louder and louder for help the terrible truth flashed through their minds that there was only one man at the windlass, and that he alone was unable to raise them both, and all this time the shaft was trembling and earth and stones falling.

As they stood there in the kebble, their bodies and hands touching, and glancing into one another's eyes, the awful thought came to them both in an instant that one of them must die—must die to save the other—his enemy.

One of them must die—but who should it be?

They again looked at one another, and there was an eternity in the glance Then one of them let go the rope and dropped out of the kebble, which immediately began to rise. Who was it? The willing martyr was Tom Polglaze.

"Tell Marg'et," he shouted, as the kebble rose above his head, "tell Marg'et I did it to save her pain—to save you whom she loves; I forgive you! but be sure and be good to ——"

The shaft gave way, and nothing presented itself to Tregear's gaze but a mass of slate and rubbish. Tom Polglaze was in eternity, as noble a soul as ever died for any cause that is dear to man; as devoted as any martyr, as generous-souled as any patriot—though only a poor miner.

It was long before Joseph Tregear and Margaret Powel recovered from that shock. They mourned the brave dead as a brother, and a neat little stone, overlooking the village churchyard, long afterwards reminded the tinmen of Tremont of the noble deed of self-sacrifice of a hero who was one of themselves.

An International Episode.

From the Washington Star.

Last evening the neat little Grace Episcopal church, south Washington, was filled to overflowing to witness the wedding of Mr. Peter McCalmon and Miss Lizzie A. Gabriel. The groom lives in the province of Manitoba, where the bride has a married sister living. Through the sister, the groom, about four years ago, heard of Miss Gabriel and a correspondence was commenced, during which, notwithstanding they had never seen each other, their feelings toward each other became more than simply friendly. The hearts of the writers glowed with love. Portraits were exchanged, and minute descriptions were given of each other. The result was that a few months ago they became engaged to be married, on condition that there was no change of feeling after a personal interview. The young lady in the meantime made preparations to leave the home of her sister, and about the first of the month arrived here. Being desirous of seeing the lady before he wrote a note to her which she failed to receive until Monday of last week, when she promptly sent him directions to find her place of residence on Missouri avenue, and he called that evening. The chains of love woven through the art of the mails, were firmly riveted at this meeting. The young lady's friends were highly pleased with the gentleman. The result was that the couple concluded that it was useless to wait longer, and preparations were at once made for the wedding which took place last evening.

HOUSE AND FARM.

Fall Ploughing.

The benefits to be derived from ploughing land in late summer or fall are probably not fully known or appreciated by the majority of our farmers. This operation is usually looked upon as one that can be dispensed with without any serious loss, and as the work must be done at a time when the farmer has begun to look forward to a season of rest, he is naturally inclined to seek reasons for omitting this addition to the list of important farming operations. The benefit of summer fallowing land previous to sowing of grain are generally admitted by all good farmers, and what is called fall ploughing is but a part of a like operation, with this difference, the weeds, stubble and grass which have accumulated undisturbed, or but slightly disturbed, during the summer, are all turned under at one time, where they soon decay, adding fertility to the soil. Wheat, rye, and oat stubble should always be turned under soon after harvest, unless the land has been seeded down, It is quite a common practice among farmers to use the fields from which grain has been cut for pasture from harvest time until winter: and while we must admit that more or less food for cattle can be obtained from such fields, as a rule weeds predominate, and if permitted to mature their seed fill the soil and become pests in future years. A glance at the grain fields in our western states at this season is sufficient to dispel all thoughts of spontaneous generation of noxious weeds, for every acre is perfecting enough seeds to infect the farms of a whole country, and when we see not only one acre, but thousands in a body, all covered with weeds, we are no longer at a loss to know where such pests come from, and how distributed. If the weeds were ploughed under before the seeds were perfected, they would make excellent manure, and the land be no worse for their presence. The richer the land the more vigorous are the weeds, and while the rich prairie lands of the west produce none of our most common noxious weeds when first broken up, they soon become the home of the rankest and worst species of these pests, because the farmer seldom attempts to destroy them unless he can do it without any extra labor or expense.

Fall ploughing, if done after the weeds have perfected their seeds, will not destroy these pests, but merely cover up the seeds to be brought to the surface again at the next ploughing. Late fall ploughing probably benefit the land by improving its condition through disintegration, which follows exposure to rains and winter frosts, and while we believe that early fall ploughing is the best, we would rather do it late than not at all.

The Barberry as a Hedge and Ornamental Plant.

From Rural New Yorker.

Perhaps a good many readers of the Rural New Yorker have never seen a Barberry hedge, or have never heard of this useful plant. The Barberry is the best shrub for a hedge. It never winter-kills; it grows on any soil; lives over a hundred years, and will turn cattle, horses, sheep, hogs, and even chickens, if planted in the right way

I have a Barberry hedge eight feet high, loaded every fall with beautiful scarlet berries, which make the very best of preserves and jellies. I have made a very good wine of the berries every fall. The yellow blossoms they bear in spring in the month of May and June are very sweet-smelling. The golden yellow roots are used for dyeing. My hedge is eight years old, has never been pruned yet, and is too-day as close as I want it to be. Last year I raised from 15,000 to 20,000 plants, and about ten bushels of the berries. This year my hedge will be, if nothing happens, loaded again with scarlet berries. There is no humbug about it. I can recommend the Barberry hedge to every farmer in the country living either in timber or prairie. It saves a good deal of hard labor in making those costly rail fences which always need repairing and always cause trouble from cattle or hogs that push their way through. The Barberry hedge has numerous sharp thorns as a protection. Even if it is destroyed by fire, it sprouts out from the roots again and makes as nice a hedge as ever. That it can be planted in new or old ground I know, because I have tried it. The richer the ground the smaller the yield of fruit. It makes a beautiful ornamental hedge around town lots.

The best time for sowing the seeds or planting the plants is in the fall or early in spring. The seed grows better if subjected to the action of the frost. During November or early in spring is a good time for sowing the seed in a nursery bed in rows two feet apart, covering the seed from 1 1-2 to two inches. I have planted Barberry seeds as late as the middle of April, which made nice plants. The plants can be put in during September and October, and even as late in the spring as the 15th of June. The young plants need no protection whatever during the winter months. Of course, fall planting gives them an early start in the spring. The Barberry is very hardy and is sure to live when transplanted; it is very seldom that one plant in a thousand dies if planted in the right manner.

Farmers' Short Rows.

The Country Gentlemen recommends planting English ivy on the bare ground under trees where grass will not grow; adding that where the winters are too severe for it when trained on walls it will often remain uninjured on the ground. Plants should be set within four or five feet of each other and plenty of old manure given.

A great many farmers, says Seed Time and Harvest, believe that the breed of hogs is determined by the amount of corn in the crib. It is true that the best breed of hogs require the most liberal feeding. In fact, it is one of the advantages of a good breed that it will make better use of the greatest amount of feed than a poor animal, but a starved pig of the best breed is the worst kind of a scrub.

A Tribune correspondent says that young horses should never have shoes imposed upon them until it is well proved that they cannot do without them. He predicts that the day is not far off when some humane benefactor of his kind will produce a breed of horses having such firm, tough feet, in addition to all other good qualities, that shoeing will be unnecessary.

A writer in the country gentleman recommends the soaking of the wood composing a summer house in crude petroleum, saying it will make any common wood nearly or about as durable as cedar, besides imparting to it a rich brown color. It would be an excellent idea to apply the same preservative to trellises, etc., on lawns.

T. S. Gold, of West Cornwall, Conn., says that the worm which produces gapes in chickens is propogated in the ground. He has found by experiment that it is impossible to raise one out of a dozen chicks when allowed to range on it, while adjoining fields are entirely free from the malady.

Oliver Baker, of Fulton county, Georgia, thrashed from twenty-nine and one half dozen sheaves of "Strawberry" oats twenty-nine bushels; from fifty dozen of "Red Rust-Proof" oats fifty bushels, and from fifty dozen "Burt" oats, grown on one and one-quarter acres, fifty bushels.

Watering Plants in Pots.

Some people attempt to keep pot plants without giving them any water at all; the result is familiar to every one. Usually, however, the earth in the pot or box is kept soaked and very much in the condition of an ordainary swamp, It is even said that malaria has resulted from living in rooms containing house plants, owing to the damp soil. We have ourselves seen dead evergreens pulled out of boxes filled with mud. Neuste Erfindung gives utterance to the following timely remarks: "Watering plants is one of the most important things in the culture of house plants, and very special care should be devoted to it. Plants ought not be wet until they need it. It will be evident that they require wetting, if on taking the earth from the pot it crumbles to pieces like dust, a sure sign is to knock on the side of the pot, near the middle, with the finger knuckle. If it gives forth a hollow ring, the plant needs water; if there is a dull sound, there is still moisture enough to sustain the plant. Plants must not be wet more than once or twice a day; on dry, clear days they require more water than on damp, cloudy days. On the other hand the earth must not be allowed to dry out entirely, for that is also very injurious. In wetting them the water must be poured on them in such a way that it will run out again through the hole in the bottom of the pot. If the earth get too dry it is best to place the pot in water so that the water will saturate the dirt very gradually. They may be watered at any hour of the day, except when the sun is shining on the pot or has just left it; for the earth gets hot when the sun shines on it, and then if cold water is poured on it, it will cool off too rapidly. The best time for watering flowers in summer is the evening, and in winter noon is best. Well water should never be used, but always use either rain water or brook water.

Sunshine for Sleepless People.

Sleepless people—and there are many in America—should court the sun. The very worst soporific is laudanum, and the very best, sunshine. Therefore, it is very plain, poor sleepers should pass as many hours as possible in the latter. Many women are martyrs, and yet they do not know it. They shut the sunshine out of their houses and their hearts, they wear veils, they carry parasols, they do all possible to keep off the subtlest and yet most potent influence which is intended to give them strength and beauty and cheerfulness. Is it not time to change, and so get color and roses in our pale cheeks, strength in our weak backs, and courage in our timid souls? The woman of America are pale and delicate, they may be blooming and strong, and the sunlight will be a potent influence in this transformation.

Cooking Recipes.

A nice way to cook a piece of the round of beef is to line a saucepan with thin slices of bacon; then lay the beef in. Cover it with water. Cover the saucepan, and let the meat cook slowly for several hours, or until it is perfectly tender. As the water boils away, add more, so that plenty will be left for gravy. Season highly with salt, pepper, celery salt or curry, and some small onions sliced.

New potatoes cooked in this way make a dainty breakfast dish: Put a large lump of butter in a frying-pan, stir in with it as it softens a tablespoonful of flour, a small onion chopped fine, and a little parsley; lastly add a small cup of sweet cream. Stir until these are well mixed, then put in the cold boiled potatoes, cut in small pieces. Let all boil together. Serve hot.

PRESERVED TOMATOES.—Take ripe, but not soft, little yellow tomatoes, and pour boiling water over them to take off the skins. Make a syrup of one pound of sugar to one of tomatoes, putting in only enough water to dissolve the sugar. Take three lemons to each seven pounds of tomatoes; slice, and put in the syrup, first removing the seeds. When the syrup is boiled clear put in the tomatoes and boil gently three-quarters of an hour.

CARAMEL CAKE.—One and one-half cups of sugar, two-thirds cups of butter, one-half cup of sweet milk, two eggs, one-half teaspoonful of soda, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar, and two and one-fourth cups of flour

CREAM FOR THE CAKE.—Two-thirds cup of sugar, one-fourth cup of sweet milk, one-half cup of molasses, one teaspoonful of melted butter, one-half tablespoonful of corn-starch, one tablespoonful of cold water, one-fourth cake of chocolate, grated. Mix all together and cook the same as for a custard. When cold, add a small bit of soda, and flavor with vanila. This is very nice.

GERMAN POT ROAST—Select a good tender piece of either beef or mutton, veal and pork can also be nicely roasted in the same way; place in your iron sauce pan or pot one good tablespoonful of lard, half as much butter and an onion cut fine; let the onion fry to a light brown and put in your meat after having washed, dried and salted it. Put the cover on and let it stand until it is pretty well browned; then add water, unless in danger of burning. Add only enough water from time to time to keep it from burning; turn it frequently so that it may brown on all sides. When tender, it will come forth brown and juicy. Just before serving see that there is enough water in for gravy, or if there is not you can take out the roast, add enough, not too much, hot water and then pour it over the meat.

TOMATO OMELET.—Peel two or three tomatoes, cut them in slices, season, and fry in butter. Beat up the egg for the omelet, season with pepper and salt, add a little minced parsley, warm some butter in a pan, pour in the eggs, stirring well to keep them from adhering to the pan; mix in the tomatoes, fold the omelet over, and turn it out on a plate, or roll up the tomatoes in the omelet and serve with tomato sauce.

RICE CAKE.—Boil half a pint of rice very soft, and when cold sift into it one pound and a half of flour; then mix in a quarter of a pound of melted butter, and salt to your taste. Beat five eggs very light and stir them gradually into a quart of milk; beat the whole well. Bake in muffin rings or muffin irons. Send them to table hot. These cakes can be made of rice flour entirely, instead of whole rice and wheaten flour.

A Valley of Roses.

From San Francisco Letter in the Baltimore Sun.

The maritime vale of Santa Barbara, for sixty miles facing the Pacific Ocean, we consider the most attractive in California. The soil is extra deep, dark alluvium. By the formation of the coast it is sheltered from the rude trade winds, elsewhere so unpleasant on our shores. San Francisco being in north latitude 37-1-2 degrees. Santa Barbara is 34-1-2 degrees north-3 degrees southwardly. Here flourish in luxuriance the fig tree and the olive, the prune and the almond, the orange and the lemon, the nectarine and the pomegranate. Here grows Alfalfa clover, giving three cuttings a year and pasture through the winter. Here flowers bloom perennial. Here only is a paradise of roses and other fragrant flowers cultivated for commercial perfumery. Here the bee pastures all the year, the hivers gather honey every day, and abstaining themselves, they give to man nearly their whole production. Only in stress of stormy weather they draw upon their hoarded sweets. Feathered songsters never migrate from this elysium. Man's dwelling is enlivened by the chirp of birds, and their music gives perpetual cheer, unchecked by winter frosts. Happy, thrice blessed, are they whose lot is cast where happiness is so lightly wood and won! Here in mid-December the company's rose gardens are a sight to charm the eye, when, day by day, children gather ever blooming flowers for extraction of perfume for the toilet. At Cezanlik, in the foot-hills of the Balkan range, in Roumelia south Turkey, north latitude 42 1-2 degrees is a valley devoted to rose culture exclusively for like purposes, but there the sale of nose-gays to many villagers is extremely profitable. There, as here, the hair and clothes of all who work among the roses retain the perfume for a week of absence from the valley.

A Remarkable Cure of a Well Known St. Paul young man—(Taken from the St. Paul Pioneer Press.)—St. Paul, Minn., Oct. 31, 1881.—Mr. S. Blackford, 274 East 7th street, proprietor of Dr. Halliday's Remedies —Sir: For the benefit of the afflicted I certify to the following: Four years ago I contracted syphilis or scrofula. I tried many physicians for two years and a half, all to no effect, still growing worse. My head, throat and mouth were one mass of sores. My hair and eyebrows all fell. I could eat nothing but soup for six months. I was so week I could scarcely walk. At last it settled on my lungs and I could not speak above a whisper. No tongue can tell what I suffered. This was my condition when I was induced to try your Dr. Halliday's Blood Purifier, Throat Gargle, and Wash through seeing in the papers the renowned Laura Moore's letter to you of a similar cure. At this date I am entirely cured. My hair has come in again as thick as ever after using the above remedies, and never felt better in my life. For the truthfulness of the above I would be pleased to have any one call on me. The scars can plainly be seen, Furthermore I have sent scores of persons similarly afflicted to Mr. Blackford in the past two years and all found the same beneficial results. I am satisfied from what I have seen that this disease, taken in the first stage, can be cured by taking one half dozen or a dozen of the large size bottles of Dr. Halliday's Blood Purifier in double doses, three times a day, and using the Wash. Hoping this may met the eye of some poor sufferer like myself in former days. I am yours in gratitude, CHARLES P. MCCARTHY, 508 Minnesota street, St. Paul.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

A SPANISH FANDANGO.

Around the sawdust ring she rode—
This comely circus rider;
Alfonso's cheeks with pleasure glowed
Whenever he espied her.
In sooth he owned he was no churl,
And didn't see the harm in Tomfooling with this pretty girl—
This Senorita Carmen.
"The Queen, I fear, is up to snuff—
I pri'the, don't defy 'er,"
Advised a certain courtier gruff—
Don Pedro H. Maria.
Alas, the King was gone too far
For sober second thinking;
He tipped the girl a tra-la la,
With multifarious winking.
Then did the Queen, Alfonso's bride,
Straightway wax hot as fire,
And called the courtier to her side—
Don Pedro H. Maria.
"Oh, take me from this dreadful place,"
The lady 'gan to bellow;
"I'll look no more upon his face—
The horrid, horrid fellow!"
"But stay you, ma'am, the king hath eyes,
And can not help admire,"
In palliation then replies
Don Pedro H. Maria.
But no, she was of stubborn mind;
So, scorning ifs and maybes,
And leaving King and Court behind,
She sloped with both her babies.
Then made the Court a vast ado,
Loud wailed the royal sire;
And long repined the courtier, too—
Don Pedro H. Maria. —Eugene Field.

FALSE ECONOMY.

"Albert, I wish you would let me have seventy-five cents?"

Kake Landman spoke carefully, for she knew that her husband had not much money to spare; yet she spoke earnestly and there was a world of entreaty in her look.

"What do you want seventy-five cents for?" asked Albert.

"I want to get some braid for my new dress."

"I thought you had all the material on hand for that."

"So I thought I had, but Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Thompson both have a trimming of braid upon theirs, and it looks very pretty. It is very fashionable and adds very much to the beauty of a dress."

"Plague take these women's fashions! Your endless trimmings and thing-a-majigs cost more than the dress is worth. It's nothing but shell out money when once a woman thinks of a new dress."

"I don't have many new dresses. I do certainly try to be as economical as I can."

"It is a funny kind of economy, at all events. But if you must have it I suppose you must."

And Albert Landman took out his wallet and counted out 75 cents; but he gave it grudgingly; and when he put his wallet back into his pocket he did it with an emphasis which seemed to say that he would not take it out again for a week.

When Albert reached the outer door on his way to work he found the weather so threatening that he concluded to go back and get his umbrella; and upon re-entering the sitting room he found his wife in tears. She tried to hide the fact that she had been weeping, but he had caught her in the act, and asked what it meant.

"Good gracious!" cried the husband, "I should like to know if you are crying at what I said about the dress?"

"I was not crying at what you said, Albert," said Kate, tremuously; "but you were so reluctant to grant me the favor. I was thinking how hard I had to work; I am tied to the house; how many little things I have to perplex me, then to think—"

"Pshaw! what do you want to be so foolish for?"

And away started Albert Landman a second time; but he was not to escape so easily. In the hall he was met by his daughter Lizzie, a bright-eyed rosy-cheeked girl of ten years.

"Oh, papa, give me fifteen cents!"

"What?"

"Oh, I want fifteen cents!" Do please give it to me."

"What in the world do you want with it? Are you changing school books again?"

"No, I want to buy a hoop. Ellen Smith has got one, and so has Mary Buck and Sarah Allen. Mr. Grant has got some real pretty ones to sell. Can't I have one?"

"Nonsense! if you want a hoop, go and get one off some ash barrel. I can't afford to be buying hoops for you to trundle about the streets."

"Please, papa."

"No. I told you."

The blue eyes filled with tears, and the child's sobbing broke upon his ear Albert Landman hurried from the house with some very impatient words upon his lips.

This was in the morning. At noon when he came home home to dinner there was a cloud over the household. His wife was sober, and even little Lizzie, usually gay and blithesome, was sad and silent.

But these things could not last long in that household, for the husband and wife really loved each other devotedly and were at heart kind and forebearing. When Albert came home to his supper Kate greeted him with a kiss and in a moment sunshine came back; and had the lesson ended there the husband might have fancied that he had done nothing wrong and the cloud had been nothing but the exhalation of a domestic ferment, for which no one was particularly responsible, and might have cherished the conviction that women's fashions were a nuisance and a humbug, as well as a frightful draft upon a husband's pocket.

After tea Albert did a few chores about the house, and then lighted a cigar and walked out. He had gone but a short distance when he met Lizzie. In her right hand she dragged an old hoop which she had taken from a dilapidated flour barrel, while with her left hand she was rubbing her red, swollen eyes. She was in deep grief, and was sobbing painfully. He stopped the child and asked what was the matter.

She answered, as well as her sobs would let her, that the other girls had laughed at her, and made fun of her hoop. They had nice, pretty hoops, while hers was ugly and homely.

"Never mind," said Albert, patting the little one on the head (for the child's grief touched him); "perhaps we'll have a hoop some time."

"Mayn't I have one now? Mr. Grant's got one left—oh, such a pretty one!"

"No, not now, Lizzie—not now, I'll think of it."

At one of the stores Albert Landman met some of his old friends.

"Hello, Albert! What's up?"

"Nothing in particular."

"What do you say to a game of billiards, Albert?"

"Good! I'm in for that."

And away went Albert to the billiard hall, where he had a glorious time with his friends. He liked billiards. It was a healthy, pretty game, and the keeper of the hall allowed no rough scuffs on his premises.

They had played four games. Albert had won two and his opponent had won two.

"That's two and two," cried Tom Piker. "What do you say to playing them off, Albert?"

And so they played the fifth game and he who lost was to pay for the five games. It was an exciting contest. Both made capital runs, but in the end Albert was beaten by three points; and with a little laugh he went up to settle the bill. Five games, twenty cents a game—just one dollar. Not much for such sport; and he paid out the money with a grace and never once seemed to feel that he could not afford it.

"Have a cigar?" said Tom.

"Yes."

They lighted their cigars and then sauntered down the hall to watch the others play.

Albert soon found himself seated over against a table at which some of his friends were playing, and close by stood two gentlemen, strangers to him, one of whom was explaining to the other the mysteries of the game.

"It is a healthy pastime," said he who had been making the explanation: "and certainly is one which has no evil tendency."

Albert heard the remarks very plainly and he had a curiosity to hear what the other, who seemed unacquainted with billiards, would say.

"I cannot, of course, assert that any game which calls for skill and judgment, and which is free from the attendant curse of gaming is of itself an evil," remarked the second gentleman. "Such things are only evil so far as they excite and stimulate men beyond the bounds of healthy recreation."

"That result can scarcely follow such a game," said the first speaker.

But the other shook his head.

"You are wrong here. The result can follow in two ways: First, it can lead men away from their business; it can lead men to spend money who have not money to spend. Whenever I visit a place of this kind I am led to reflect upon a most strange and prominent weakness of humanity as developed in our sex. For instance, observe that young man who is just settling his bill at the desk. He looks like a mechanic, and I should say from his manner and from the fact that he feels it his duty to go home at this hour, that he has a wife and children. I see by his face that he is kind hearted and generous, and I should judge that he means to do as near right as he can. He has been beaten and he pays one dollar and forty cents for the recreation of some two hours' duration. If you observe you will see that he pays it freely, and pockets the loss with a smile. Happy faculty! But how do you suppose it is in that young man's home? Suppose his wife had come to him this morning, and asked him for a dollar to spend for some trifling thing—some household ornament, or some bit of jewelery to adorn her person—and suppose his little child put in a plea for forty cents to buy paper and picture books with, what do you think he would have answered? Of fifty men just like him, would not forty and five men have declared that they had not the money to spare for any such purpose? And, moreover, they would have said so, feeling that they were telling the truth. Am I not right?

"Upon my word," said the man who understood billiards. "You must speak to the point. I know that young man who has paid his bill, and you have not misjudged him in a single particular, and what is more, I happen to have a fact at hand to illustrate your charge. We have a club for an excellent literary paper in our village, and last year that man was one of our subscribers. This year he felt obliged to discontinue it. His wife was very anxious to take it, for it had become a genial companion in leisure moments, but he could not afford it. The club rate was one dollar and fifty a year."

"Aye, and so it goes," said the other gentleman. "Well, that man's wife may be wishing at this very moment that she had her paper to read, while he is paying almost its full price for a year—for what? And yet how smiling he does it. Ah! those poor, sympathizing wives! How many clouds often darken upon them from the brows of their husbands when they ask for a trifle sum of money and how grudgingly the mite is handed over when it is given! What perfect floods of joy that dollar and forty cents might have poured upon the children of that unsuccessful billiard player. Ah it is well for such wives and children that they do not know where the money all goes."

They had finished at the nearest table. The two gentlemen moved on and Albert Landman arose from his seat and left the house. Never before had he such thoughts as now possessed him; he had never dwelt upon the same grouping of ideas. That very morning his own true, faithful, loving wife had been sad and heart sick because he had harshly and unkindly met her request for a small sum of money. And his sweet Lizzie had crept away to her home almost broken-hearted for the want of a simple toy, such as her mates possessed, and yet the sum of both their wants amounted to not as much as he had played away that evening for billiard playing.

Albert Landman wanted to be an honest husband and father, and the lesson was not lost upon him. On his way home he stopped at Mr. Grant's and purchased the best and greatest hoop to be found, with stick painted red, white and blue, and in the morning, when he beheld his child's delight, and had received her grateful, happy kiss, the question came to his mind which was the best and happiest result—this or the five games of billiards? The hoop cost thirty cents. He could play two games of billiards less and be the absolute gainer of ten cents by the pleasant operation.

"Kate, what is it?"

"Albert, could you spare me half a dollar this morning?"

And out came the wallet and the money was handed over with a genial smile.

What! Tears at that! Was it possible she had been so little use to such scenes on his part, that so simple an act of loving kindness thus affected her?

How many games of billiards would be required to secure such satisfaction as Albert carried with him that morning to the shop?

A very simple lesson, is it not? But how many may gain lasting profit by giving heed to the lesson?—Home Companion.

Perry Visits the Circus

At half past eight o'clock Monday morning an aged couple who had driven 10 miles to see the circus, hitched their team near the western Haymarket When old Dobbin had been secrred they moved across to the big tent, and the woman said:

"Now, Perry, don't get excited. A circus is a circus the world over. We'll go slow, and see everything on the outside, and then jog back hum."

"Mebbe we won't! You solemnly promised me over and over again before we left hum that you wouldn't go in, and I shall hold you to it. We'd look purty in a circus, wouldn't we?"

"I didn't promise nuthin' about side shows," observed Perry, as they edged along with the crowd. "Here's them wild men of Bunkio or Barney-oh, or some such place in Europe. I've alius said I'd see 'em if I got a chance.

"Perry Baker, are you demented?" she asked. "You let me catch you sneakin' into a side-show and I'll never live with you another day."

The dulcet tones of a lemonade stand now fell upon their ears, and the old man was licking his chops and bearing off in that direction when his wife checked with him:

"What you after now! 'Taint five minutes since you swallowed a pint of cold tea, and you ain't a bit thirsty! Perry, don't you undertake to sneak out of your solemn promise!"

The couple got along down to where the living skeleton and the fat woman and great contortionist held out:

"Right this way, old man? This is your ony chance to see a living man weighing only 35 pounds!"

"I'm a comin'!" shouted Perry, in reply.

"Not a rod—not a foot!" said his wife, as she seized his arm.

I'm a-goin' to see that skeleton if it takes a leg! It's the first chance I ever had, and it may be the last!,'

But he didn't go in. She walked him aside, dodged two peanut stands, crawled under two wagons, just missed a snake exhibition and held him up on the outskirts of the crowd, and calmly remarked:

"You promised and promised, and now you want to break it. Perry Baker, we're goin' back hum, and when we get out past the tollgate you and I will have a settlement."

"What's the harm in a circus, Mary?" he argued.

"It's the principle of the thing. It's setting' a bad example and wastin' money. Come along!"

"Say, let's go clear around this tent."

"Not a rod."

"Let's have one glass of lemonade?"

"Not a swaller, Perry, You come hence!"

He crossed to the wagon with her, and she climbed in. While she was lifting herself up he bolted, and when she turned around he was gone. She stood up and called him by name as loud as she could yell until a policeman ordered her to stop, and then she got down and said to a boy about 16 years old:

"Bub, I want you to come with me. My old man has cut loose, and he'll never stop seeing wild men and living skeletons and fat women and red lemonade as long as he's got a cent left."

"How much'll ye give?"

"I'll give ye a quarter, if we find him. I want to steal upon him before he knows it. I want to find him in front of the only boaconstrictor on the North American continent, and I want to open a performance which will discount this circus all holler."

She was last heard of at the door o the circus. Having failed to find him elsewhere she was about to pass in when the ticket taker objected.

"But I'm looking for Perry."

"Can't help it ma'am."

"I wont be in only long enough to lead him out."

"Won't you find out if Perry is in there?" she persisted.

"Can't leave the door, ma'am—better get a club and wait for him! Fall back—fall back— tickets off this side!"—Detroit Free Press.

That Wicked Telephone.

From the Detroit Free Press.

"I guess I haf my telephone took out of my house," said a resident of the eastern part of the city as he took a seat beside Manager Jackson the other day.

"Anything wrong?"

"Yes, eafrytings is wrong," was the doleful answer.

"Perhaps the battery needs more water?"

"Vhell, maybe so, but I doan keep no track of dot. You see, I vhas down to my peesness a good deal. "I shall certainly look into the matter. Such things must be stopped."

"Und sometimes somebody softly rings, shust like cats, and my vhife wants to know who vhas dot. Me! Who vhas me? Katie! Who vhas Katie? He was promised speedy and permanent relief, and as he backed upstairs to the sidewalk, he said;

"Vhell, dot makes me feel like I vhas happy. If somebody wants to hello! Shake!' on me, let him come to my saloon. I gif him some telephone convenience so he vhas lame for six months!".

How a Married Woman Goes to Sleep.

Instead of thinking what she should have attended to before going to be bed she thinks of it afterward. While she is revolving these matters in her mind, and while snugly tucked up in bed, the old man is scratching his legs in front of the fire, and wondering how he will pay the next month's rent. Suddenly she exclaims:

"James, did you lock the door?"

"Which door?" says James.

"The cellar door," says she.

"No," says James.

"Well, you'd better go down and lock it, for I heard some one in the back yard last night."

Accordingly James paddles down stairs and locks the door. About the time James returns, and is going to bed, she remarks:

"Did you shut the stair-door?"

"No," says James.

"Well, if it is not shut, the cat will get up into the chamber."

"Let her come up, then," says James, ill-naturedly.

"My goodness, no!" returns his wife; she'd suck the baby's breath."

Then James paddles down stairs again, and steps on a tack, and closes the stair-door, and curses the cat, and returns to the bedroom. Just as he begins to climb into his couch, his wife observes:

"I forgot to bring up some water. Suppose you bring up some in the big tin."

And so James, with a muttered curse, goes down into the dark kitchen, and falls over a chair, and rasps all the tinware off the wall in search of the "big" tin, and then jerks the stair-door open, and howls:

"Where the duce are the matches?" She gave him a minute direction where to find the matches, and adds that she would rather go and get the water herself than have the whole neighborhood raised about it. After which James finds the matches, procures the water, and comes up stairs and plunges into bed.

Presently his wife says:

"Now James, let's have an understanding about money matters. Now next week I've got to pay"——

"I dont know what you'll have to pay, and don't care," shouted James, as he lurches around, and jams his face against the wall; "all I want is sleep."

"Thats all very well for you," snaps his wife, as she pulls the covers viciously; "you never think of the worry and trouble I have. And there is Araminta, who I believe is taking the measles."

"Let her take 'em" says James.

Hereupon, she begins to cry softly, but about the time James is falling into a gentle doze, she punches him in the ribs with her elbow, and says:

"Did you hear that scandal about Mrs. Jones?"

"Where?" says James, sleepily.

"Why, Mrs. Jones."

"Where?" inquired James.

"I declare," said his wife, "you are getting more stupid every day. You know Mrs. Jones, that lives at No. 21? Well, day before yesterday Susan Smith told Mrs. Thompson that Sam Barker had said that Mrs. Jones had—"

Here she pauses and listens. James is snoring in profound slumber. With a snort of rage, she pulls all the covers off him, wraps up in them, and lies awake until two a. m., thinking how badly used she is. And that is the way the married woman goes to sleep.—Ex

Current Notes.

In Baltimore, according to a bookkeeper's statement, the wages of entry clerks per week are from $5 to $7, shipping clerks from $6 to $10, and bookkeepers from $5 to $15, with the average at $8. Hod-carriers get $15 a week, bricklayers $3 and $4 a day, and cellar-diggers $2. One reason given for the hard times among the clerks is, that there are many rich fathers who place their sons in wholesale houses with the understanding that they are to receive nothing the first year. In some cases it is known that money has been paid to obtain positions for wealthy men's sons. Another reason is that there are so many young men who go to the city from the country, and are willing to work for next to nothing.

It is a wonderful fact that shipping, as old as civilization and once the great carrier of the world's commerce, has been far outstripped in its capitalized value by the railroad, an institution but little more than 50 years old. The value of British shipping is $1,000,000,000; value of British railroads, $3,700,000,000; value of American railroads, $6,300,000,000. Great Britain herself, the queen of marine commerce, finds her railroad investment to treble that in shipping, while our railroad plant nearly double in value that of the mother country.

An illustrated edition of Gray's Elegy to be brought out this fall reproduces rejected verses—those which appeared in the original editions but were afterward omitted. The most exquisite of these was originally inserted before the "epitaph," but was omitted because the poet "thought it was too long a parenthesis in this place." The stanza is very graceful:

There scattered oft, the earliest of the year,
By hands unseen, are showers of violets found;
The redbreast loves to build and warble there,
And little footsteps lightly print the ground—

At a great Irish meeting in Chicago, where ten thousand people participated in the celebration of the first demonstration of the National League of Irishmen the most sensible remark of the day was made by Thomas Brendan. He said: "The league proposes to establish reading rooms all over Ireland to educate the people and to teach them that intelligent demands must be listened to. This is the shorter way to Irish freedom. It is not very revolutionary, but it is surer and safer, it will teach men how to hold their own. It is not he that shows lip applause of dynamite, but he who takes the lamp of knowledge to the people of Ireland who will achieve her freedom."

Another old story is spoiled. It has been printed a thousand times that the revival hymn "Hold the Fort" was founded upon an incident connected with the fight of Allatoona, in the Atlanta campaign—that Sherman signalled from Kenesaw Heights to Corse, "Hold the Fort, for I am coming," and that a piously determined answer came. But no such message was sent or received. Sherman was on Kenesaw during the Allatoona fight, but was unable to get any answer to his signals for a long time. At last, by the aid of powerful field glasses, the signal officer saw the flag through the embrasures of the fort display letters which meant, "Corse is here." After the fight, Colonel Dayton, an aid-de-camp of Sherman's, received the following characteristic but impious despatch from General Corse: "I am short a cheek bone and an ear, but am able to whip all h—ll yet!" It is difficult to see how such a message could have been made the basis for a revival hymn, but by the aid of a little romance it was done.

Gossiping about the large hotels of New York and the costly habits which they stimulate, the "Lounger" of the Tribune touches upon a hidden feature of hotel life thus: Many a guest is in debt and cannot get away from his hotel. Many a woman, apparently independent and fortunate, is wondering, while she smiles with visitors, how she can get her trunks away from the establishment and what person she may strike for a loan, and at what sacrifice. People often look into the tenement houses and think that the people must be very miserable there, but I wonder if they are not happier homes than some of these large hotels, where every week comes the reprimand that $200 or more is due and the rules of the house imperative.

WHY I AM A BACHELOR.

"I do wish, Bob, you would get married," cried my mother impatiently, one day after she had endured my company a whole long summer evening.

The suggestion was by no means a new one, for I was five-and-thirty, and it had been iterated and reiterated by all my family ever since I was twenty-five. I therefore regarded my mother's remark as the beginning of a kind of family ritual, and responded as usual.

"Why so, ma'am?"

"Granted," said I.

"Yes," pursued my mother, "you're old enough and you're rich enough, and you're clever enough; and why you don't get married I can't see. You would then be much happier than you are now, idling about here with nothing better to do than to follow an old woman about from cellar to pantry, putting your hands to every bit of mischief which "Satan finds for idle hands to do"—and all for want of some sensible employment."

"Would petting a foolish wife be a sensible employment?" I asked, laughing.

"She need not be foolish," said my mother.

"But the wise virgin will not have me," I replied, "and I will not have a foolish one; and there is just my trouble.

"You are too modest by half," returned my mother, as she was leaving the room.

I pondered that last remark of my mother's. I thought it showed discernment and judgment, and wondered more people were not of her way of thinking. The melancholy general reflection that modest worth is almost sure to be underrated threw me into a pensive and sentimental mood, and snatching up my hat and fishing tackle, I sauntered out for a reverie under cover of my favorite sport.

The subject of my late conversation continued to occupy my thoughts. The truth is, my mother was not more anxious to see me married than I was to be so. I had always regarded the married state as the happiest; my heart glowed as much as any man's ever did, at the picture my fancy drew of a loving family and a happy home. But the mischief of it was I could not find any one to please me. I did not consider myself, nor mean to be, over-fastidious; but among all the flat, fluttering, furbelowed fine ladies I met in society, I found so little nature, so little goodness, so little heart, that I could not fall in love with them, let me try as I would.

It was truly a lamentable case. Here was I, a really clever enough fellow—well-to-do in the world—considered as I knew well enough, something of a catch—willing and anxious to be caught, and nobody skillful enough to do it.

Pondering this gloomy thought, I wandered on quite beyond my usual bounds, and at last, rather tired, I clambered up a steep rock which overhung the brook I had been following and sat down to rest.

It was a true summer scene—quiet and warm and bright—nicely shaded, however, where I lay, and the cool sound of the rippling water added the only charm possible, where all was so charming.

I listened with delight, but in doing so became sensible that, besides the regular momentous babbling of the brooklet, there mingled other sounds of splashing water, at irregular intervals, and which seemed to proceed from below the rock on which I reclined. My curiosity led me to explore the mystery. I clambered to the top of the rock, and looked down over its furthest edge.

Cupid! god of love! how I was rewarded! The rock on the side over which I looked descended sheer some fifteen or twenty feet, when a projecting ledge formed kind of natural seat, below which the water rippled. The spot was quite hung over and shaded by trees and thick shrubs. It was a complete sylvan grotto, and within it, as seemed most meet and fitting, was its nymph.

A young girl, apparently about nineteen, sat on a rocky ledge, bathing her feet. Her attitude and occupation reminded me strongly of the pretty picture we have all seen in old fashioned annuls of Dorothea—except that my little beauty was evidently gay and fresh and lively, while Dorothea in the picture is weary and sad.

I could not make up my mind for a time to disturb so charming a scene, and therefore continued to gaze in silence from my lurking place.

Ah! those dainty little white feet with their pink-tipped toes, which gleamed so fair through the clear water, or flashed for a moment above its surface, flinging about the bright, glittering drops, and then plunging again beneath the cool pine—never shall I forget them. The gracefully bent head, with its bright golden curls and braids, against which now and then the sun sparkled from a chink in the leafy screen—the lovely neck and arms—the cheek delicately tinted with pink, of which I now and then got a glimpse, form a picture more enchanting than anything I had ever imagined. More than all, the perfect innocence and modesty which accompanied all the movements of my sweet Diana charmed me even more than her beauty.

My heart of ice suddenly burst into a flame. "Heavens!" cried I to myself, as I felt it thumping against my side; what is this new sensation? Rob Brown your hour is come. Pour in love!"

At the moment I came to this conclusion the float on my fishing line dropped at the feet of my charmer, and immediately—well, I'm not going to lay before my confidential public an account of my delicate and skillful manœuvering; enough that within half an hour I was seated socially by the water fairy's side, trying to look as much like Neptune or Massaniello, or any other water hero, I did not care much which, as I could.

I gave a sly tweak or two at my shirt collar to make it lie down sailor fashion, turned back my wristbands, and kept my hat carefully, so that one spot on my crown, which was growing thin, might not be observed, and flattered myself that I should do well in my new role.

Nora—I soon discovered her sweet name—was most charmingly gay and chatty. No prudery or thoughts of evil ruffled the current of her childlike, innocent thoughts. She was a careless child at play, glan of a playfellow.

I would gladly have lingered for hours in the enchanted grotto, but ere long Nora rose and sauntered forth. I followed endeavoring to beguile the flowery way she led me, as agreeably for her as the wolf did for Little Red Riding Hood, while schemes, as deep laid and appropriate, though less bloodthirsty towards my innocent companion, formed themselves in my mind.

I was never in such spirits. I was charmed with myself in the novel character of a wooer. The railroad rapidity with which my drama proceeded excited me. In one short hour, I, the impregnable, the flinty-hearted, had not only fallen head over heels in love myself, but also flattered myself—but most of all things, I hate a boaster. However, as I have said, I was in high spirits and excited, and, among other nonsense ventured at last to say laughingly:

"Do you know, sweet Nora, that I have been haunted by a singular presentment ever since the moment I first caught a glimpse of you?"

"What is it?" asked she, smiling.

"That you will one day be my wife," I exclaimed with bold emphasis of conviction and determination.

Nora burst into the merriest of laughs, and at the same moment turned into the little path which led down from the door of a rose-wreathed cottage. A young and handsome gentleman advanced hastily to meet us, and Nora, with the demurest of mischievous smiles, courtesied low, as she presented her "husband." I saw the look of mingled coquetry, mischief and curiosity which she stole at me from under her down-cast lashes; I saw the difficulty she had to suppress the merriment—I saw what a fool I had been making of myself, and I turned precipitately to fly.

Nora's pent-up laughter now burst forth; peal after peal rang on the air, and I heard my tormenter call after me: "Pray, pray, Sir Angler, return, and I will show you my baby!"

Well, ladies and gentlemen, 'Tis twenty years from that day to this; but I'm a bachelor yet, and I suppose I always shall be; for I am as far off as ever from finding my ideal.

I cannot say the adventure I have narrated had any very lasting effect upon me—and yet it had though; for since that same summer afternoon I have never gone angling; and if I ever chance to see a silly girl paddling her feet in the water, I run as if ten thousand girls were after me.

Our Codfish Aristocracy.

Richard Grand White in the North American Review.

Whatever they may have failed to acquire of Europe's long-storied social and mental wealth, few of them failed to learn to imitate the least admirable of the manner and customs of Europe—those which lie upon the surface; those which might be gathered from a superficial observation of the most pretentious and most frivolous society, the only society in Europe to which such casual travelers or such transient sojourners would be admitted. The pitiable spectacle of the American colony in Paris during the second empire may be passed over here without remark, but the effect of these and their like upon society in the United States has been deplorably debasing and vulgarizing. The observation of "high life" by such spectators, so transient, so ignorant, so incapable of thought, reveals to them nothing which may not be obtained by an expenditure of money; and briefly (for I must brief), this vast increase of wealth, this democratic equality and these skippings over the surface of European society, working together, have produced as their resultant a social monster called in the newspapers "Society" or "World of Fashion." Now society and fashion (singular, inexplicable word, thus used) are no new things here but not this society, this fashion. Some money is necessary always for the formation and maintenance of a cultivated society; some exclusivneess must be practiced, or your society rests upon money only; not upon property, possessions, estates; but upon sheer money that may be put in a box and carried about, got one day and lost another, like a watch or a toy, and with no more social disturbance; and this exclusiveness excludes only those who have little money, and as to the bears, shuts many of them not out but in. Let any man who chooses so to spend time and trouble read the highly interesting paragraphs under the "World of Society" and "Circle of Fashion" headings in three or four of our leading newspapers, and if he has any particular knowledge of society, and a knowledge which extends backward beyond the war, he will see that quite seven-tenths of them relate to people who at that time would themselves not have dreamed of themselves as persons of gentility (to use an obsolecent word), not to say of consideration or fashion. People without breeding, without education; whose every word and every tone (surest evidence on such a point) betrays the inferior associations in which they grew up, whose language, whether they speak or write, would be put to shame by that of a well-bred upper servant in England, and whose notions of politenes are confined to the observance of etiquet which can be taught to a monkey and poured into a man, and yet more easily into a woman, as liquor can be poured out of one vessel into another, who have indeed generally a sort of formless, insipid good-nature, but of courtesy, inborn or inbred, no conception whatever. They have simply money—money which they are ready to spend for their own coarse pleasures, money which they are even willing to give away—for their own aggrandizement, money which they are anxious to use in every mode which will enable them to "get on" and make a figure. Besides these, who are hundreds and thousands, there are others not so prominently rich, who are tens and hundreds of thousands, that are of like origin and social history, and who all more or less affect elegance and "aristocracy," and talk of society and fashion. Most, but not absolutely all, of these, like most, but not absolutely all, of the others, are wholly, utterly lacking in any claim to distinction from the crowds that swarm to Barnum's greatest show on earth, except money, money gotten quickly, and, in many cases, not honorably, although not illegally. But because of their money and their gross and selfish expenditure of it, they, or rather (it is but right and fair to say) very many of them, seem to think that they have a position in this country corresponding to that of the leaders of society in Europe; for example the nobility and gentry of England. They keep their fathers and their mothers hidden away,—in closets upstairs, or in the waste places or remote corners of the land, and set up for people of fashion upon fine clothes, bric-a-brac, and champagne.

The Delights of Country Life.

From the Cincinnatti Commercial Gazette.

"Hello, Mr. Spivkins, moving again?"

"You see me here amid the debris of a once happy home," replied Spivkin's. "But my wife called the dance, so I grabbed the coal scuttle and swung in for another cotillion with the furniture van. The twins and the canary bird are coming with the next load."

"Been living in flats again?" asked the news man.

"Oh no! Flats are not lofty enough now. My wife grew ambitious. She wanted a place in the suburbs, one of those fifteen minute walk from the train Swiss cottage, gable ended country mansions, with every modern convenience and lots of expense, where we would be free from the dust and dirt of the city, have plenty of butter and eggs, fresh air and a goat for the children."

"And you had a goat?"

"Oh, yes, we had several; one wasn't enough."

"How's that?"

"Why, it was too exhausting upon one to keep all the trees in the neighborhood barked, eat up all the old boots, hoop skirts and tramp down all the adjoining gardens, and not liking to show any partiality amongst them, or prejudice against this particular goat, I got several to assist him."

"And the butter and eggs? You had plenty, I suppose?"

"Plenty yes! kept all the dogs in the neighborhood lean trying to suck the them as the hens laid them."

"Did your hens lay so fast?"

"Oh, no, not my hens—no, these were the grocery man's hens—my hens had their hands full a setting. Why, I had one hen that sat for four weeks under a barrel, in a tub of water, that never laid an egg in her life. Another sat on a screw driver and a monkey wrench in a horse trough for a fortnight, and so determined was she to become a mother that six roosters with a peck of worms couldn't tempt her to move. We finally concluded it was cheaper and more convenient to buy eggs then wait for another generation of chickens so the grocery man was called in. To really enjoy country life and get health, pure air and lots of mud, a man never wants to go beyond the suburbs He must keep within hearing of the street car driver's whistle and tin peddler's voice. He must carry home a market basket every night and then occasionally a bundle of brooms and a ham and when he sits down on the back porch at eve, with a towel over his bald head to keep the mosquitoes off, he will think with fondness unimaginable of those $10 apiece roasting ears and $3 tomatoes that his wife and the gardener are going to raise next summer if his purse holds out.

"Have you bought your ticket to the gymnasium yet?"

"No."

"Well, don't do it. Go and buy you a place in the suburbs."

Wit and Humor.

The faith cure is nothing new, for faith that can move mountains ought to easily drive away 'ills.

"Yes," said the toper, sadly, "I know drink is my enemy; that is the reason why I am always putting it down."

"Oh, dear!" sighed Mrs. P., with a toothache. "Why can't people be born without teeth?" "If you will reflect a moment, my dear," replied Mr. P., "you will be convinced that such is the fact."

One of the most trying moments in a man's life is when he is getting his picture taken to send to his best girl, and is just assuming his most angelic expression, and a fly alights on his nose.

Brakeman—The train is now about to enter the State of Missouri. Gentlemen who have not provided themselves with carbines will pass forward to the locomotive and crawl into the tender."

A man who refused to pay a thousand dollars for the land upon which Cincinnati now stands, when he could have bought it for that amount, died a few days ago in a New Hampshire poorhouse. This should teach us not to refuse to pay a thousand dollars for land upon which a big city will stand seventy-five years hence.

A paragraph is going the rounds of the press to the effect that Mr. Gould is having a lot of saints and angels painted for his tomb. This is a mistake. The artist has been given an order to paint a life-size representation of a camel passing through the eye of an needle.

A New York paper having printed an item stating that a soda fountain had exploded, seriously injuring three persons, was obliged to print a large extra edition to supply the demands of young men who wanted to send a marked copy to their summer girls.

A young man writes us for light on a delicate subject. He says he has fallen in love with a sweet girl to whom he has just been introduced and whose home he has never visited, and he wants us to tell him how to open the campaign. Well, we should first endeavor to gain the respect and esteem of the dog, if the girl's father keeps one.

"Why do you discard the military profession for that of journalism?" asked a gentleman of a conceited country editor. "Because," replied the provincial scribe, "the pen is mightier than the sword." "Yes I know; but that does not apply to you," said the visitor. "Why not, sir?" indignantly demanded the scissors-wielder. "Simply because the phrase is qualified by the phrase preceeding it—'In the hands of men entirely great.'" sarcastically explained the subscriber as he softly shut the door from the outside.

A fact: Two gentlemen were questioning why professional men should so frequently be bald. The little daughter of one had been an attentive though unobserved listener, but made her presence and opinion known by suddenly exclaiming: "Oh, papa, I know; it's so that their wits can come out."

Some time ago a dispatch was sent from St. Louis to Memphis, addressed to "James Giles, pie clerk, steamer Magenta. There was no man named Giles on the boat, and the message was not delivered, whereby a law suit ensued. The person named was James Gilespie, clerk of the Magenta.

Regrets: Miss Gushington (to young widow whose husband has left a large fortune)—"That is the fourteenth mourning costume I have seen you wear in three days and each more lovely and becoming than the other." Young widow—"Oh, my dear, I have 40; but such a bother as they were to have made! At one time I almost wished that George hadn't died."

"Now," said an Austin lawyer, taking his client to one side for private consultation, "you may be hung but I'll do what I can for you. You must, however leave everything to me." "Well, that's blamed cool," replied the client. "They told me before I went into the case that I would have to pay a good sum; but when it comes to leaving everything to you, I guess I might as well back out and let the case go by default."

When Grant became president some friends, knowing his taste for high-flavored tobacco, sent an order to Havana for 4,000 of the largest and strongest cigars that could be made, cost being no consideration. They were duly sent, when the order was completed, to New York, and cost without duty $800 a thousand, or 30 cents apiece. They were so strong, however, as not to be smokeable even by the general, and he had to give most of them away to any of his friends who would accept them.

Gen. David G. Swaim, judge advocate general of the army, has been asked as to his opinion of the power to try a retired officer of the army by court martial during time of peace, a question upon which many officers seriously disagree. He says there is ample authority, but when asked as to the power to order a court martial to try Maj. Nickerson, on charges growing out of his queer matrimonial complications, Gen. Swaim said that it was probable that no charge of a military offence could be brought against that officer.

SEPTEMBER.

Fair Spring came dancing o'er the earth
To the music of the spheres,
And in her train tripped laughing June,
Love's promise to the years;
But now the sweet and radiant maids
Again have tripped away,
And Summer pauses at the door
To bid the Fall good-day.

September, bright and royal one,
Our hearts are ever true;
And though we miss thy sisters fair,
'Twill be the same with you.
Our orchards wait thy ripening touch,
Thy warmth, the winter's grain;
And we, dear heart, need something, too,
To help us bear our pain.

So cold, so dark the days will be
When thou hast said good-bye;
Why is it that all precious things
Are only born to die?
Oh, would, September, we could take
Example from thy days,
Live sweet and smiling—go the same—
God's blessing on our ways.

TOM GLANDERS OF SQUATTERS' GULCH.

A STORY OF COLORADO.

The Stranger was drunk. There was no mistaking it. He was also ugly. There was no room for a doubt of that either. Physically, mentally and morally, he was both drunk and ugly. The hilarious patrons of the Tarantula saloon had for some hours been watching his increasing opulence of alcoholism and combativeness with that interest which always marked them when prospects of a fight became prominent. In Squatters' Gulch a fight was as full of attractiveness as a strawberry festival notoriously is in a New England village. The sturdy pioneer who conducted the local theater had been known to take advantage of this fact with great financial profit to himself. Being aware that two of the most energetic warriors of the surrounding country had sworn to carve and otherwise render each other the reverse of ornamental, or even useful, the first time they should meet, this genial person sent each of them a complimentary ticket to his hall. He then caused to be circulated the report that they were to be present at the Alhambra Palace—such was the resplendent title by which his resort was known to local fame—upon the evening following. His losses had been severe. The inhabitants of Squatters' Gulch had no fondness for dramatic art as here interpreted. Macbeth, Hamlet and Sardanapalus, performed by six persons, had no attractions for their sordid senses. Therefore he had lost money. But his reverses were amply set right by the stroke of managerial genius which I have here recorded. The house was packed. So were the roofs of adjacent buildings, where eligible standing-room brought as high a figure as $20 per square foot. The canvas top of the Alhambra Palace had been removed for the occasion, and the view was good. The warriors met. One of them requested the other, with that poetic sense of chivalry which characterized the early mountain settler, to spit in his eye—an invitation which was promptly accepted. The fight that followed was always remembered in the Gulch. How the Tall Slasher of the Rappahannock dexterously removed both ears from the head of Sacramento John, and was himself most elaborately lacerated in return, are matters of history. The town went half-mad with admiration, and what was left of the two accomplished young gentlemen involved in this little entertainment was for years regarded almost with reverence.

It may be supposed, therefore, that the movements of the Stranger, upon the night of which I write, were viewed with something more than common interest. One by one the leading citizens had dropped into the Tarantula saloon during the evening, until the tables were all well surrounded, and the bar was lined with watchful observers.

"Who's the stranger?" inquired Tom Cathcart, in a careless way, as he dealt three cards to Judge Gashwilder.

"Dunno," briefly responded that judicial luminary, throwing his hand down in a disgusted way; "he's on'y just arriv', and it's my legal opinion as how, if he keeps on, he'll reach the end of his lariat extremely quick."

"I've half a mind," mused Mr. Cathcart, pleasantly, "to rise up and give him a benefit myself. I don't like no Missouri mud-eater to stand the boys up like he's doing."

"Never mind," affably rejoined Judge Gashwilder, with that air of authority which gave his opinions upon the bench great weight; "hold on a bit. Fur-lined George will be along soon, and the stranger will have to take water then. Let him go on. Gimme two cards."

"Hello!" ejaculated Mr. Cathcart, a moment later; "the ball has begun."

Everybody in the room had arisen to his feet. The tall Missourian, a man of angular frame and sinister visage, had at last succeeded in drawing somebody into a controversy. The citizens of Squatters' Gulch were about to be entertained.

"Humph!" muttered Mr. Cathcart, "it's a d—d shame for him to pick a row with Glanders. The poor chap can scarcely hold his own head up, let alone fighting. I've a mighty good notion to sail in myself."

"Hold on," cautioned Judge Gashwilder, with his index finger laid knowingly along his nose; "Thomas Glanders is all right; he is slow but sure. Look there!"

The quarrel at the bar has been growing louder. The Stranger, inflamed with the fiery liquor he had been drinking, had selected one of the least offensive men in the settlement as the special object of his displeasure. This person, a Mr. Thomas Glanders, was a quiet, respectably dressed man, with a stolid face and a dejected manner, who was looked upon in a friendly, often a pitying, light by his companions. There had been something sad in his life—that was known to the entire population of the Gulch. What it was, no one precisely knew, and no one cared. But nearly everybody took an interest in him, and not a soul lived in the town who would not have fought for his sake at any time.

The Stranger was heaping abuse on Glanders' head—abuse which he could not comprehend, and which seemed to half bewilder him. But the offensive Missourian went on, goaded to increased fury by his own words. Still Glanders stood helplessly gazing about him, making no reply, but occasionally passing the back of his rough brown hand across his forehead. Finally, in a transport of rage, the Stranger drew a revolver. Then Glanders seemed to awaken. He spoke for the first time.

"Put it up," he said, quietly, "or I will kill you."

The Stranger laughed, and the crowd, angry and menacing, began to close in upon him. Glanders motioned them back.

"Put it up," he repeated firmly, "or I will shoot you in your tracks."

The Stranger fired, and a part of Glander's hat fell to the floor. Few of the citizens of the Gulch had known or would have believed he could act with such decision. He had hitherto been thought by them to be a slow and easy-going person, too inoffensive to be trodden upon, and too gentle to respond with violence. But upon this occasion he belied his reputation. Quick as lightning—so quickly that only one or two in the room saw the movement—a derringer sprang from his pocket, a deep report sounded through the room, and the Stranger fell to the floor.

There was silence for a moment. Then the wounded Missourian, after writhing a moment where he lay, beckoned Glanders toward him. He was no longer violent. The fumes of drink had quite evaporated from his brain, and he realized what had happened. Glanders, whose anger had disappeared as quickly as it came, when he saw he was the victor and his life was no longer threatened, stepped forward and raised the Stranger's head to his knee.

"Whisky," he said, shortly, to the barkeeper.

The liquor was brought, and he poured it between the Stranger's lips. It was a dramatic scene. So deep, so solemn was the coloring of the picture that not a man in the crowd—usually a turbulent one—had as yet uttered a word. The wounded man, somewhat revived by the stimulant, motioned Glanders to lean closer, and he obeyed. There was nothing but pain in his red face now, and great beads of perspiration stood out upon his forehead. The Stranger whispered a few words brokenly, and then suddenly fell back, dead. Glanders lowered the man's head to the floor, and then slowly arose to his feet. The hush which had some time ago fallen upon the crowd was not yet disturbed.

"Boys," said Glanders, in a voice which trembled slightly, "I hated to do it, but it couldn't be helped. I'm sorry it was so, and I'm willin' to abide by what you say. If it was murder, string me up, and be d—d quick about it."

A murmur that arose almost to a shout ran through the room. Every man there endorsed his course. Glanders began to move slowly toward the door. He paused once, drew his hat down over his eyes, buttoned his coat tightly about his throat, and thrust his hands into his pockets with an air that indicated a purpose.

"Poor things!" he muttered, as he strode into the night. "They're orphans now, and I made 'em so!"

* * * * *

Drawn back some paces from the roadway, close to the trunk of a tall pine tree, some distance from the sturdy settlement of Squatter's Gulch, was one of those huge, ungainly vehicles which, in the early days of pioneering, were known as prairie schooners. Near by, dimly seen through the darkness, were two lean, unhappy-looking horses, browsing in a helpless way upon the scant herbage which the place afforded. At the foot of the tree a heap of smouldering embers showed that there had been a small fire earlier in the night. This was the scene in which Glanders peered half an hour after the tragic occurrence I have just described. For a long time he sat, thoughtfully and silently, upon the pole of the wagon. So far as any sign of his was concerned, he might have been asleep. Possibly he was going over the events of the evening. Perhaps he was framing a scheme for the future.

When more than an hour had thus slipped by, he came out of his revery, and arose to his feet. Thomas Glanders was a methodical man. For years he had plodded along in a quiet, careworn manner, accomplishing nothing that any of his companions could discover, but never complaining of ill fortune or pain. Men supposed he must have money. He lived well, but unobtrusively, and he never had difficulty in meeting his obligations. To the suffering he was always kind. Indeed, the local clergyman, who found but few sour grapes in his vineyard, was wont to say that Thomas Glanders could be relied upon, when charity was needed, to give as liberally as a gambler. But there was no ostentation about him. He lived by method. He arose and went to bed at certain hours, he ate at prescribed times, and he drank his four glasses of whisky every day as regularly as he breathed. His was a purely matter-of-fact life. Whatever bad luck came to him—and it was altogether out of proportion to his good fortune—he accepted it without a word of complaint. If, as was rarely the case, he had a touch of more than ordinarily pleasant luck, there was never a sign of jubilation in his conduct. He rarely talked, saving when words were absolutely necessary. What he had to do he did, and he made very little fuss about it.

When Glanders arose from his position upon the pole of the wagon, his first operation was to pile a few sticks of wood upon the coals. In a little while there was a blaze, which, after sputtering a moment, gave out considerable light. This illumination, or the sound of Glander's footstep about the place, apparently aroused some degree of life inside the wagon, for there was a slight movement, and then a childish voice, rather petulant in its tone, said:

"Shet up!" responded another voice, obviously that of a lad, "or you'll get another larrupin'. Ef he's full, he's easy."

Glanders leaned against the tree, and all became quiet again. For the second time since he had arrived upon this scene he fell to thinking, and, as before, his reflections were so absorbing that he lost all consciousness of what was passing around him. He did not even notice that the canvas flap of the wagon was raised, and that two very big blue eyes were peering cautiously through the aperture thus formed. It was entirely without his knowledge that the owner of those curious eyes stole out of the wagon and crept slyly toward him. Not until she spoke was he aware of her presence.

"Where's the old man?" were the first words Glanders heard.

They startled him slightly, and he looked earnestly into the young face that was upturned to his. Perhaps it was the flickering of the firelight that caused the quick shade that fell across his face. But it looked like an expression of pain. The girl, annoyed at his silence, went on, impetuously:

"Don't you hear? What in blazes is the matter of you? Where's the old man?"

"Down the gulch," replied Glanders, slowly and with some difficulty.

"Oh," said the girl, with an odd mixture of sarcasm and curiosity. "He sent you up to say he was drunk, I s'pose. He said he wouldn't be home till he got good and ready—didn't he? Told you to tell us to look sharp, or he'd lick both of us when he got home, I reckon—hey?"

"Does he beat you, then?" asked Glanders, with a weak attempt at evasion.

"Does he! Now you just bet he does. And I've got my opinion of a big loafer that licks a little gal like me, what can't help herself. Some day he'll wake up the wrong outfit, and then he'll get put under the daisies with his boots on—you hear me?"

Glanders did hear her, and he shuddered. But he was strangely attracted by the big-eyed, rough-spoken little girl, who stood there looking him in the face and ejecting her words with an energy that would have been ludicrous under other circumstances. She was a slender child, perhaps twelve years old. Her hair was curly and light, and it fell in a tangled mass over her forehead and neck. She was poorly clad, and her brown feet had long been strangers to the cramping influence of shoes. There was a touch of great pity in Mr. Glanders' eyes as he looked at this child standing there in the firelight and regarding him fixedly.

"Come here," he said, after a while; "come here and talk with me. I want to ask you some questions."

He went over and sat down again upon the pole of the wagon. The girl looked at him a moment without moving. Clearly her first impulse was to resent his suggestion. But that design lived only for a moment, and she approached him without shyness.

"I'll do it," she declared, in a voice from which the sharpness had all gone. "I don't know who you are, but I like you, though I can't tell why. It ain't cause you're handsome—that's dead sure."

Glanders paid no attention to this uncomplimentary allusion to his personal appearance. With him it was no time for idle words or thoughts.

"Tell me," he said, when the girl had settled herself on the ground in front of him, "do you like the old man?—are you fond of him?"

"Well," responded the girl, after a pause, "I can't say as I'd like to eat him. He's too handy with the back of his fist to make me so awful dead in love with him."

Glanders sighed, as though he felt relieved from some anxiety.

"But then," the girl went on, with childish frankness, "you can't quite hate a man when he's the only pertector you've got. Ugly as he was, he put all the bread into my mouth as ever went there, and I've got to remember that. Sometimes there wasn't much of it, and sometimes it was mighty queer bread. But as a gen'ral thing he did the best he knowed how, and—— Say, what are you thinking about so hard?"

Glanders was just at that moment thinking he was about the darkest criminal in the world. To save himself from possible destruction, he had killed a fellow being—an act, I regret to say, which was not sufficiently infrequent in those days, and in that section, to call for any special regrets upon its own account. But Glanders reflected that in depriving the Missouri bully of his life, he had also taken away the only prop upon which this helpless child leaned for support. It was a reflection which filled him at first with dismay and self-reproach, and then with a certain definiteness of purpose.

"Sis," said he, after a moment, passing his hand over her straying curls with a kind of rough tenderness that was not without its element of magnetism; "sis, ef thar was a man—mind ye, I don't say thar is a man—but of thar was one as comes to you and says, says this man, of so be as you two children wants a home, bein' without one, ye can come and live along of me, and though it ain't a refined and elegant abode, bein' built as it were in the first rude stages o' civilization—ef any man was to say this to ye, and your dad didn't par-ticularly mind, what would you answer?"

The girl looked full in his face.

"Answer? Why, I'd collar the offer like chain-lightning—only," she hesitated an instant—"only the old man never'd stand by and let me have such a good thing as that—never."

"He'll never bother ye any more, my child," said Glanders. "Do ye feel very bad about it?"

"Bad?" she echoed.

"Yes. The old man has been took, as it were, to put it gently, to Abraham's boosom. He was killed, my child, and the man what offers to take ye into his home is the one as did it."

The young girl started back, and regarded Glanders with a strange expression. It was not a look of repulsion, or anger, or fright, but rather a look of astonishment. Presently, after peering into his eyes for some little time, she said:

"Then I don't believe it was your fault. You ain't the kind of a man to do that sort of thing 'thout a cause. And as for me, it's a-stonishin' he hasn't ketched it afore."

"Then," said he, "we must be movin'."

In the morning the camp of Squatters' Gulch was surprised to see a huge emigrant wagon drawn up to the door of Glanders' cabin, and, later in the day, it was still further astonished to observe two children, a boy and a girl, playing about the place. Who they were, and where they came from, was a deep and absorbing mystery. That their advent was connected with the death of the Stranger was not a theory which occurred to many of the citizens. One of the leading expressions put forward by those who conversed upon the subject was the proposition that Glanders' supposititious wife in the States—an appendage which was attached in a greater or less degree to the main bulk of the population of that salubrious locality—had forwarded her children to be cared for by their legitimate protector. But whatever Squatters' Gulch may have thought or expressed upon the subject, Squatters' Gulch did not carry its curiosity offensively near to Glanders, or his cabin on the hill.

Meanwhile, in the cabin itself, there were some odd developments. The new residents had quietly domesticated themselves with that affluent confidence which is the distinguishing trait of that migratory childhood of the West, which, being cast this way and that by the changes which constantly occur in new countries, readily accustoms itself to fresh surroundings. One night, sitting before the fire, with his short clay pipe in his mouth, and the children on the floor at his feet, dreamily regarding the coals, Glanders broke the silence.

"Sis," said he, "I don't want to pry into no family secrets of yourn, cos it ain't none of my business porticklerly, but, at the same time, it ain't reasonable for me to go on always a-callin' of ye 'Sis,' and the young chap 'Bub.'"

"That's so, I reckon," promptly replied the young girl. "My name's Lucy Bryton. And his'n," pointing to the boy, "his'n is Robert. His t'other name ain't like mine, though, 'cause he's only a 'dopted brother. His name is Rathbun—Robert Rathbun. Hello! What's up, Mr. Tom?"

"Nothin'," replied Glanders, whose face had suddenly become rigid. "On'y I drapped my pipe, that's all. Go to bed, youngsters. I want to think. Hold up a bit. What became of yer mother, Bob?"

"Dead, sir. Drowned in the Missouri overflow. I haven't seen her since I was a baby."

When they were gone, and for hours afterward, Glanders sat looking gloomily into the fire.

"Pore gal," he muttered, after a long time. "Ef matters had come out a leetle different, that would hev bin my boy. Mine. Well, what's to hinder now?"

Having by some acute mental process convinced himself that nothing was to hinder, Glanders went thoughtfully to bed.

* * * * *

The soft autumn days, gilded by the clear and genial Colorado sun, melted slowly away into the crisp and vestal winter. Then came the budding spring, the lazy summer, and the blushing autumn again. So the weeks glided into months, and the months closed into years, until Squatters' Gulch, ashamed of its rough and uncouth name of other days, adopted the more exalted title of Clarion City. There were other changes, too, in the general atmosphere surrounding the place. The rough and somewhat uncouth dwellings which formerly covered the steep sides of the ravine had almost entirely disappeared, and their places were filled with more sightly cottages. The business part of the town had grown commensurately with the other portions of Clarion City, and the place presented an altogether sightly appearance, cozily tucked away among the pine-clad foothills.

In a tasteful cottage, far toward the outer edge of the settlement, lived Mr. Thomas Glanders and the members of his family, who have heretofore been described in this veracious narrative. It was a pretty place, and it was marked here and there by the unmistakable traces of a woman's presence. Neat curtains hung in the windows, a hammock swung on the veranda, and a trailing vine grew up over the door. One night, as the sun was climbing down across the western sky, the veranda was occupied by two young people. A strong, hearty young man was swinging in the hammock, while sitting beside him, idly moving the network backward and forward, was a lithe and graceful girl. She was blushing deeply, but not hanging her head. There was, indeed, in her large blue eyes a look of open frankness, which I do not think is often found about the faces of young women when they are discussing the subject which was at that moment occupying her attention.

"There is something which seems almost like sacrilege about it, Robert," she said, with a touch of remonstrance in her voice. "I had grown to think you my brother in reality, as well as by association."

"But you love me, Lucy. You have told me so." His voice was deep and not unmusical to the ear. And it had about it, in the line of pleading, a persuasive tenderness which, I fear, more than one of the fluttering damsels of the Gulch had found it difficult to resist. But Miss Lucy was not of the common sort, and she did not heedlessly assent to the proposition advanced.

"What," she asked presently, "would he think?"

It was apparent that the young man did not require a more definite descriptive term to understand who was referred to.

"He would scarcely object, Lucy. You know he loves both of us very dearly, and his greatest happiness would be in making us happy."

"True," replied Miss Lucy, thoughtfully. "But if—if he would rather we did not seek this kind of happiness, Robert—you know we owe him a very great deal. Our home, our rescue from an existence that would have left us both more to be pitied than if we were dead, our education—all were given us by him. We can scarcely do anything that may bring him pain, Robert."

The young man in the hammock was silent for a moment.

"Tell me," he said, in a little while, "why you suppose there is any danger that he will object."

Miss Lucy's face assumed a deeper scarlet. "I—I—well, nothing. It is probably my imagination."

"Will you ask him?"

Another pause. Then, in a low voice: "Yes, I will ask him to-night, if he does not speak first. If he consents, Robert, I will do all that you have asked."

"That's a dear, sweet Lucy," exclaimed Robert, springing to his feet and kissing her lips. "We shall be very happy."

As he strolled down the hill, Miss Lucy's eyes followed his retreating figure sadly. When he was gone she drew a long and slightly tremulous breath, and laid her head against the post. She still sat thus, with her eyes bent upon the ground, when a heavy footfall aroused her attention. Mr. Thomas Glanders, returning from his office at the mouth of the Giant mine. Not quite the Thomas Glanders we have known heretofore. His eyes were serener now than of old, and his tread had not that element of hesitation which formerly marked it. Thomas Glanders, mine owner and operator, with a pretty home, and the benefits of solicitous female society, was rather inclined to be an ornament to his sex, although there were moments, I must relate, when he did not occupy a similar relation to the English language.

"Good evenin', Lucy," he said, kindly, as he drew a chair up to her side and seated himself so that the folds of her dress brushed against his knees. "I met Robert as I came up the hill. A fine boy, that, Lucy. I'm as proud of him as if I had been his father."

A moment of silence, during which Miss Lucy breathed a trifle quickly. One hand lay unemployed in her lap. Glanders picked it up and held it in his own. It looked so small, so white, so lovely, in his great palm, that he speedily covered it up by drawing his brown fingers about it.

"Its a whiter hand," he began slowly and reflectingly, "though it ain't much bigger than it was when I first took it into mine, that night under the big tree. Ah, my girl, I didn't see then, and didn't seem to imagine that you would be so dear to me some day. I didn't know that in the course of time you would get to be—what you are to me. If I had"——

Another pause. This time Lucy was slightly trembling.

"If I had," he continued, "I should almost have been afraid to see you."

"Afraid?" The word came reluctantly and almost in a whisper.

"Afraid I might some time lose you—afraid that some other love but the regard you had for clumsy, poor-spoken old Tom Glanders might some day be stole away by a deeper, a greater regard for another man."

Mr. Glanders arose and walked to the other end of the veranda. Then he came slowly back and placed his heavy hand, light enough now, upon the sunny head.

"Lucy," he began, "child, you are more to me than I can tell you—more than I know, God help me. There is but one happiness for me, but one rest after my life's struggle. And it has been a struggle, Lucy, that ain't always been easy for to get the best of. But, Lucy, I don't want to find fault nor complain, if it has brought me you: Eh? Why, child, you are cryin'. Deary, if I've said anything that's grieved you, don't mind me. Lucy, I'll never speak of it again, so long as I live. I take it all back, Lucy, I do, so help me God!"

Mr. Glanders was down by her side, holding her hands and trying to soothe her. In a moment she became quite calm.

"You have been kind to me," she said, after a little while. "I was only a Stranger's child—a Stranger who would have taken your life. You took me in, and cared for me, and worked and toiled for me, so that I might have comforts and be happy. You took me, a ragged, rough, ill-bred child, and you gave me the chance to become a lady. You have earned my—my love, and"——

"Don't speak that way, Lucy. I didn't calculate to buy your heart. I didn't, Lucy, and I wouldn't take it like that."

"You didn't buy it, you—you won it. Tom, I love you very, very dearly. It may not be the kind of love you expect, just yet; but, by and by, when we have grown used to each other, when we have forgotten that we were"——

"Father and daughter, almost," he broke in. "Are you sure, Lucy? Will you never regret this?"

"Never!" she cried, impulsively. "But let it be quick. Do not wait a day, but have it done at once! It—it must be without delay, or—or"——

She did not finish the sentence, but with a sharp, convulsive kiss upon his brown cheek—a kiss which sounded almost like a gasp—she was gone. In the gloaming upon his porch that night, sat Mr. Thomas Glanders, a very happy man. Behind him lay all the gloom, and sorrow and pain could never come to him now. In the future—what? He could not answer, though it seemed very bright.

* * * * * *

It was quickly and quietly accomplished. Almost before the staid citizens were out in the streets, Mr. Glanders and his bride had walked to the little chapel down the ravine and back again. He noticed that Lucy was very pale that morning, and that there were long, deep lines in her face. Clearly she had not slept; but Mr. Glanders attributed the fact to a weakness of the sex, and imagined that a little familiarity with the new relations would soon wear it away. Robert did not come home during the night—a habit which, I am obliged to confess, is not uncommon among the compatriots of his years. Mr. Glanders had wished to defer the quiet ceremony until his arrival, but Lucy had refused with a feverish haste, which her companion set down to the score of diffidence. It was some hours after the marriage that Mr. Glanders, failing to stir up any enthusiasm in Lucy's breast regarding the various topics of conversation, kissed her tenderly and strolled out for a walk among the trees.

"She's better alone for a time," he muttered, apologetically, to himself. "When I come back in half an hour she'll be as bright and cheery as ever."

For a long time after he went away Lucy sat looking blankly at the wall. Then she arose and walked out upon the porch, and stood looking down the hill, where she had last seen Robert pass away. In a few moments she became conscious that some one was near her. It was Robert, white as a ghost, and trembling nervously. She looked into his face, but could not speak. There was a deep, pathetic inquiry in her eyes, which spoke more plainly than words.

"Yes, I know," he said, in a strained and worried fashion. "I heard it as I came up the street. I shall not reproach you, Lucy, for, if he asked you to marry him, it was the only return you could make for all his more than fatherly kindness."

There was a footstep not far away, but it was not noted by the two young people.

"I have come, Lucy," continued Robert, in the same hurried and unnatural fashion, "to say good-bye."

"Robert!" she gasped, "do not, do not go away."

"I must," he said, in a strange tone, regaining a part of his own force as he saw a touch of weakness in the woman he loved. "There is no other course. It would break my heart to stay here and see you the wife of another. It would wear out my honor, my gratitude, my manhood. Day by day all that is good about me would fade and fade away, until I died of shame and mental agony, or became a reproach to all the world. It must be, Lucy. We love each other too dearly to have it otherwise."

She was silent.

"Good-bye, Lucy," he said, more quietly, taking her hand.

For a moment he held her hand in his. At the same instant a shadow that had been thrown by the sun across the ground almost at their feet, began slowly and stealthily to steal away.

"Try," said Robert, struggling hard to regain his composure, "try to forget me. You can only find happiness in that oblivion. Or, if you think of me sometimes, remember me only as the brother who grew up with you and loved you with—with only a—a brother's love. Good-bye. God bless you, little sister."

He turned on his heel and took a step forward. The sharp report of a pistol from the rear of the house arrested his attention.

"What was that?" asked Lucy, turning if possible a shade whiter.

In a moment they were both under the great pine tree which stood a few paces up the side of the hill. What they saw at that moment will never be forgotten by either of them. Stretched upon the soft carpet of pine-needles, with a look of ineffable gentleness in his fast glazing eyes, a smile on his lips, and her portrait on his heart, lay the rigid figure of the husband of the Stranger's child.

August, 1883. LEANDER RICHARDSON.

A TROUBLED HEART.

In the quivering ocean
Wavers the image bright
Of the moon, whose motion
Through heaven's vault in light
Is still and true, yet tender
Its radiance and its splendor.

So still and true, mine own,
Thou ever art my light;
In my sad heart alone
Wavers thine image bright
How can a troubled breast
Reflect an image blest?

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Woodwork.

A lady who understands the process of staining woods can, at small cost, make her cottage home look very handsome. A little practice will give to the hand a free and easy motion while imitating fine woods, the choice of which should be copied from the genuine, in order to correctly imitate the color and form of the grains as presented in nature. Take the grain color (which depends in hue upon the wood to be imitated); this is mixed in beer, whisky or vinegar, which binds the color, and so prevents it from rubbing off; now take a sponge rung out of ale, and dampen the wood, which is primed with almost any light color; the second coat is the tint desired, and the third coat is the color to grain upon. It is almost impossible to give a positive statement as to the specific quantities of the ingredients; the proportions are best regulated by experience, governed by individual taste. To imitate rosewood great care should be taken in correctly glazing, blending and blazing. This caution holds good in imitating mahogany and oak. Glazing colors are transparent, thinly mixed. In mahogany glazing add a little asphaltum to the grain color, which is burnt terra de sienna; also add ale to this mixture until it is quite thin; rub it over the wood. Asphaltum for glazing must be dissolved in turpentine, and it is well to add a little boiled oil to check it from drying too soon. To produce a fine rosewood out of ordinary pine make the ground color rose pink. This is mixed with asphaltum; the grains are put in with pencils such as are used by professional grainers; the knots and shadows are wiped out with a bit of rag or sponge in patches to suit the fancy. Blend crosswise in imitating manogony. Maple wood is very handsome and not difficult to imitate; the grain color is raw sienna and raw umber mixed well together, wipe out the lights with a bit of buckskin, the edge of which gives the curl natural to this kind of wood; varnish, and when dry dampen with the grain color, which is made thin by the addition of a little asphaltum; wipe out the large light patches with a sponge, and then blend the light by crossings; when dry use the glaze color for a grain finish. If the bird's-eye effect is desired, take a wet sponge and wipe out speck of light after the grain color is laid on; blend the whole, and dot it with the ends of the fingers, and then lightly blend, which is the finishing process. Oak for a dining room is handsomely imitated. Paint with a mixture of chrome yellow and Venetian red and grain color is raw umber and raw sienna, made light and brilliant with whiting mixed with boiled oil. Paint over the wood and comb while damp, first lengthwise, and then run the comb with a trembling motion over the same crosswise. Carefully wipe out the grains of light; hold the cloth over the thumb-nail, changing its position at every touch. After glazing with asphaltum, wipe out large patches of light, and with a sash tool darken other spots. The grain color for imitating black walnut is burnt umber; the ground color is made of Venetian red, black and yellow ochre equal proportions, well mixed. Take a flat brush and a piece of buckskin for wiping out the lights.

Hats.

Hats are large, in English walking shape, with narrow brims, small cavalier and Alpine hats. The crowns are large and square, and the trimmings are massed well to the front. Fancy feathers and velvet are the favorite trimmings and many ornaments are used. Felts come in all the fashionable shades to match the new dress goods, gray, brown, green, garnet, raspberry, red, navy blue, etc. Three ostrich tips, mounted very high, with velvet bands held by buckles, encircling the crown, is a popular mode of trimming English walking hats. Some of the new hats have the crowns of green felt in narrow strips interwoven with moss green chenille for the crown, while the felt brim is faced and bound with moss green velvet.

Vivid contrasts are in order, scarlet and gray, orange and black, blue and gold, green and gold, etc. Worth's new combination of brown and green finds much favor, and is very effective in velvet of the new cress green on a dark brown hat. All the coffee shades are revived, and magenta color is again in favor, brought back by the fancy for the purplish pinks known as the Judic shades. A handsome hat of gray felt, in cavalier shape, has the wide brim faced with gray velvet. Under the brim, on the left, is set a cluster of gray ostrich tips, while on the right side, which droops low, is another cluster of tips and a scarlet bird which, together, almost cover the crown of the hat.

Another hat, in the same shape, has a narrow brim, also faced with velvet and uncompromisingly straight. Loops of velvet in two-inch width, overlapping closely, form a band round the crown, with bow and buckle in front, above which are three short ostrich tips and a wing set high, à la cockade.

Scarfs of loosely-woven chenille and pompons of narrow velvet ribbons, or crimped silk tape or chenille, are used for trimming misses' hats of fancy felt, with the edge of the brim bound with velvet.

The great novelty in ornaments are small paws, squirrels' paws, hares' feet, ermine paws, etc., mounted in silver, steel or gold, as the case may be. Steel ornaments, as already said, are much liked, and there is quite a fancy for tortoise shell for use on brown velvet. Small ornaments made of feathers, a cook scarcely two inches long, but a perfect copy of the real bird, a white macaw or green cockatoo, less than three inches in length, and pheasants in miniature are imported, mounted on pins all ready to be stuck into bow or scarf for decoration, and form an agreeable variation on the feather butterflies of last year. Later on feather crowns are to be very fashionable, with just a border of velvet covering the brim of the bonnet frame. The new ribbons are velvet on one side, satin on the other, some in straight cords like corduroy, others plain.

Bangs.

The dressing of the hair has much to do with the choice of a bonnet. It has been a mooted question for some months whether the "bang" shall be or not be, and those who have returned from watering places report that it is singular and surprising to see how many women, maids, and matrons appear on the strand and at the hops with smooth hair, plainly divided in the center, guiltless alike of bang, wave or frizzing. Perhaps there is a solid fact at the bottom of this, to wit: that sea air is lamentably deficient in its appreciation of bangs and frizzes, and uses successfully every effort in its power to reduce their beauty to ugliness. If, however, we may be allowed to quote again from the same source as above we will give the following anecdote as a better and more striking accentuation of our own and popular opinion on this point than anything that occurs to us just now. It is credited by our authority to William B. Travers: "A man had met a girl in a lonely place and forcibly kissed her. She was terribly indignant, and had him arrested. She gave an account on the witness stand of how he gazed on her intently, and then, suddenly throwing his arms around her, imprinted a kiss upon her lips. The prisoner made no defense, and the jury was expected to promptly convict him of assault. They returned to the court room. Mr. Travers was foreman of the jury.

"The ju-ju-jury would like to ask the young lady two questions," he said.

The judge consented, and she went to the stand.

"D-d-did you wear the J-j-jersey that you've g-g-got on now?"

"Yes, sir," was the demure reply.

"And w-w-was your ha-ha-hair b-b-banged like that?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then, your honor, we acquit the p-p-prisoner on the ground of emo-mo-mo-motional insanity."

So long as the bang is so bewilderingly effective as that narration implies the united influence of the clergy can not abolish it. It will remain a feature of hair dressing next winter, though in varied forms. And women will do well to harmonize their hair with their bonnets.

Girls Who Copy Langtry.

There is an easily detected tendency on the part of certain of the more progressive of the fair sex assembled here, says a Narragansett letter to the Providence Press, to get themselves up as near like unto Mrs. Langtry as possible. There is one young lady in particular, whose presence is a familiar one at hotel hops, in the vicinity of the rocks, and on the bathing beach. So closely does she resemble the guileless Langtry in face, dress, and bearing, that an involuntary exclamation of surprise arose from the lips of a well-known theatrical manager, with whom your correspondent was conversing as she passed. She is truly a second edition of the famous English woman, when superficially viewed, and possibly it might not be regarded as a horrid libel if the assertion were made that the resemblance is the result of a carefully-studied toilet, with the photographs of the Jersey actress as a model. A few days ago a vision of pretty womanhood in the person of a charming young lady burst on the vision of a small circle here like a new star in a constellation—so unique a type of female attractiveness as to merit the little attention now given here. She wore a wavy, blonde peruke, cut short behind at the nape of the neck, not that nature had shorn her of the crowning glory of her sex, for the secret of the existence of thick masses of bronze-brown hair beneath the artificial locks was an open one. Large, clear, gray eyes, a perfectly aquiline nose, a little cherry-lipped mouth, disclosing the slightly irregular, but each one of itself perfect, teeth, beneath the curve of the Cupid's bow above, a complexion that would stand the test of a plunge in breakers without shedding the smallest fraction of its delicate, rosy bloom, and a figure that would not appear to disadvantage in the latitudinous Long Branch bathing "dress." Across the water the professional beauty is not the exotic she is here; there, a strikingly pretty face is photographed, paragraphed, and its possessor made much of in society, so long as she remains within the narrow limits and does not invade the domain of Mrs. Grundy. Of course, this refers to England. On the other side of the channel it is a sine qua non to do just the reverse. When I hint that the specimen of the order who briefly sojourned at the Pier is well known to metropolitan theater-goers as an actress among the best in her line in the country, and that she preferred to remain incognito while here, the story is completed.

Walking.

No habit is more inelegant than that of walking with toes turned in, or straight forward of us, like the Indians; it always suggests a defect of character quite out of proportion to the bodily imperfection, as one may realize any day who will take the pains to observe the movements of those who believe that while it is proper to pay attention to their heads, the feet will take care of themselves. Watching a succession of children on their way to or from school, we shall notice some who seem to tip up the inner side of the foot and step on the outer edge of the shoe sole, as if thus to escape painful pressure elsewhere. This kind of awkward walk originates in the wearing of too short shoes; others display a firm but elastic gait, their feet directed sufficiently outward. Some place the foot flat on the ground, but turn the toes in. As in other things, the majority range between the best and the worst; one or two in 100 will be "splay-footed," but this is infinitely less objectionable than to be "pigeon-toed." We once knew of a girl of fourteen who was the despair of her first dancingmaster because of the fault in question. Her efforts to obey his orders failed to sufficiently relax the muscles of her ankle. She, however, was a determined character, and made up her mind to overcome the difficulty or die in the attempt, and she hit upon a plan which succeeded admirably. Every spare five minutes in the day she spent standing at her chamber window with her feet extending laterally against the wainscotting. This settled the case in less than ten days. As the instructor in foreign languages finds it desirable at first to exaggerate the unaccustomed gutturals and linguals, in order that his pupils may afterward fall back with ease on the correct pronunciation, so my young friend found that by pressing out her feet at right angles previously, she attained the desirable adjustment of pedal attitude, and was no more a reproach to ball or street.

Autumn Colors.

The leading color in millinery, as in dress goods, is gray and pigeon-gray, not the orthodox dove-dray, nor drab, but the soft, light gray of the barnyard pigeon is the favorite among grays. There must have been wholesale slaughter among such fowl to provide all the gray feathers which are shown—wings, breasts and heads—pompons and bands. A few whole birds are shown, but not many. The fancy is for wings and breasts chiefly, arranged in clusters, to which may be added a head or bow of velvet, with buckle, as preferred. Gray heron's feathers are very stylish, and a plume of these, together with two or three gray breasts, is a leading fancy. The gray sea-gull is also among the fashionable favorites this season.

Flowers are devoted solely to evening bonnets; fancy feathers are all the rage, and in these ingenuity runs riot. Besides the gray plumage already mentioned, and the host of tropical birds which have been worn for many winters, all of which reappear, there are many miniature birds manufactured by human fingers; small peacocks, which cover the whole front and crown of a small bonnet, miniature pheasants, etc. A lovely creation is in pale buff, with cropple crowned head, with breast and wings, specked with impeyan points, and long tail of heron's feathers, in pale buff. Other dainty fancies are in upright rows of beautiful feathers in alternating stripes of bright color, ruffled like the plumage of an angry bird. All colors harmonize or contrast well with gray, and the scarlet tanager, the blue jay, the black and yellow oriole, the gemlike Brazilian humming bird, and the brilliant impeyan, are alike used by Parisian milliners on gray velvet hats and bonnets.

Hearths.

One can get the hearths from $9 to $90, and they vary in beauty as in price. There is the familiar arrangement of alternate squares, and then the less familiar panels, where one large tile occupies the middle of the hearth, say a turquoise blue with heraldic designs upon it, set in tea-pot browns, and two hand-painted panels at either side, set similarly, with a border of old gold and black. The brass fender goes just inside this border. In other hearths the tiles are gilded, making a very brilliant display when a fire is burning in the grate, but wearing only a short time. The finest and newest thing, however, is mosaic work, each stone laid separately in cement, and forming beautiful patterns in the richest of colors. These, of course come much dearer than the tiles, but they are much prettier. A fender goes around the edge of these. Thus far samples only have been imported, made of a fluted perpendicular tile about six inches high by four in diameter. It has a very handsome finish, especially for a rather small room where a brass fender cuts off the perspective. The same effect is gained by having none, and this is a frequent practice. To go with the mosaic hearth there are backs and sides of the same to be placed or set in the chimney in place of the iron or bronze, which is somewhat common, although much used. Andirons are made for wood or to support movable baskets, which are, however, in much better style supported simply on rollers or their own feet. Some are suspended in the middle or at the side, and are swung in and out to empty. It was an odd thing that wherever we went to look for grates the first question asked was, "Do you wish them for use?"

Children.

You cannot over-estimate the importance of surroundings upon the physical and mental condition of the children. Choose for them a large, sunny room, well lighted, and in winter well warmed; here collect the treasures that delight children, and hang the walls with pictures, scenes from the good old fairy stories, that go down from generation to generation. Try to get games that mean something; animals to take to pieces and put together again, horses to be harnessed into carts, etc. Have it laid down as a nursery axiom that broken things do not mend themselves, and that wilful destruction of property is followed by going without. In this way you can check restlessness. Have meum and tuum respected. The small inhabitants of your "earthly paradise" may borrow courteously from each other, but must never violate the laws of property. Make the children pick up their toys, and wait on themselves when possible; and absolutely forbid their making their nurse a slave. In this way they will learn to be self-helpful and self-reliant. Win the children's confidence by proving yourself a sympathizer in every joy and sorrow. So few of us older ones realize how all-absorbing the affairs of the present are to the little ones, and how easily the tender feelings are wounded, by even the implied suggestion that you don't care.

Follies of Pretty Women.

A correspondent who attended the garden party given by the prince and princess of Wales, writes: One thing I much regretted to notice, and I regret all the more to say it, that it was most marked in respect to one or two American young ladies, and that is the artificial decoration of the face—penciled eyebrows and lashes, and cheeks blushing under their roses. This hideous fashion is on the increase in London and in New York. But why the pretty girls of England and America who can really boast of complexions should do this is a problem I will not attempt to solve. I can only hope that every father, husband and brother, and mother, who has any influence, will join every sensible woman of their acquaintance, in an effort to nip this "bridal bloom," or "Persian tint," whatever it may be called, in the bud. It is as demoralizing as it is unlovely. As for tight lacing, it seems to me that ever since our first mother left the garden of Eden we have been unavailingly trying to put that fashion down. But as cholera and yellow jack are not deadly enough among the other ills that flesh is heir to, our women (Heaven bless and forgive them!) will insist upon making sacrifices to this moloch, "the bodice." This can never be helped until every woman is compelled to pass an examination in anatomy and Greek sculpture, and even then, some Worth or other man Milliner, I suppose, will always be to the fore to make fools of them. Perhaps it would not do if they were perfect. Angels are very likely insipid; I do not know; but anyhow I would like to draw the line at Indian ink and rouge in the sunshine.

An Ivy Screen.

There is no running plant that is so useful in artistic decorations as ivies (hedera helix). Their cord-like stems can be twisted to suit curves and corners to a nicety. The old Celtic word for cord is hedra, hence the generic name of this plant, which is a native of Britain, from which many varieties have been brought into existence. It is well known that old castles and stone churches are often more than half covered with deep green leaves of ivy. In this country these plants are not so flourishing in the open air as in some portions of Europe, yet they have attained great height here and luxuriant growth when planted in a shady place near a stone building. The hardy ivies require but little care in propagating. Cut a portion of the stem and place it in almost any kind of soil, loam, peat, or sand, and it will thrive, and with special attention to the cultivation it will grow rapidly. Many lovely ornaments may be made of ivy. A unique screen formed of this plant is extremely attractive, and it is easily made. Take a closely built and narrow box (the length of the screen desired), and fill it with sand, mixed if possible with barnyard soil; be sure to place in the bottom of the box, at the depth of two or three inches, pieces of bricks and a few small stones such as are used in paving streets. This rocky layer produces, or rather retains, the moisture that ivy so constantly requires to give it health and growth. Trail the ivy for the screen over net wire, painted dark green; as the plant grows the small shoots should be trained to run in and out of the wire meshes. This interlacing will give to both sides a charming effect, producing a sort of living screen, always freshly beautiful and exceedingly useful.

Fire Baskets.

Movable baskets in an open fireplace are the only thing now bought, whether for show or use; and to go with tile hearths there are tile facings, from the cheap ones at $10 to those at $45. In some of the handsomest, caryatids, or figures which take their place, stand at the sides, and conventional designs fill the rest; or a renaissance pattern in many colors on a black or dark-blue ground makes a continuous design around the whole opening; or, for a library, illustrations from Longfellow or Tennyson are very pretty and suggestive. The chimney itself is, in this case, lined with iron or bronze, or, when a slight fire only is required, glazed tiles are used, which produce a pleasanter reflection, but do not stand so much heat. Some persons prefer metal facings, and there is a great variety in these, all of which are quite new and dear. Some have narrow brass rims; others broaden until there is a band of polished or antique brass eight or ten inches wide surrounding the whole opening, and worked in etching, repousse, or cast in rich figures. Some are of steel inlaid with brass, which produces a dazzling effect. The greatest inclination, however, is not for these bright, flashing things, but the dimmed metals, which look as if already worn and ready for the parlor-maid's hand. Fire irons of the antique brass are the most looked for, and should be laid on the hearth supported by the andirons inside the fender, instead of standing in a rest at the side.

Alaskan Women.

The matrons of high fashions and the swell damsels of the Thlinket tribes never make a canoe voyage without smearing themselves well with the black dye that they get from a certain wild root of the woods, or with a paste of soot and seal oil. On sunny and windy days on shore they protect themselves from tan and sunburn by this same inky coating. On feast days, and the great occasions, when they wash off the black, their complexions come out as fair and creamy white as the palest of their Japanese cousins across the water, and the women are then seen to be some six shades lighter than the tan-colored and coffee-colored lords of their tribe. The specimen woman at Juneau wore a thin calico dress and a thick blue blanket. Her feet were bare, but she was compensated for that loss of gear by the turkey red parasol that she poised over her head with all the complacency of a Mount Desert belle. She had blacked her face to the edge of her eyelids and the roots of her hair; she wore the full parure of silver nose ring, lip ring, and ear rings, with five silver bracelets on each wrist, and fifteen rings ornamenting her bronze fingers, and a more thoroughly proud and self-satisfied creature never arrayed herself according to the behests of high fashion.

Hair.

The hair dressers in solemn council assembled have agreed upon three styles that are to be the mode this autumn for locks, real or assumed. No. 1, have the hair cut about three inches deep from the forehead, and put it in paper so as to make large soft curls—what we call at present Langtry curls—or use a false piece to take the place. Wave the hair on the temples with crimping pins or the tongs. The rest of the coiffure is made of curled hair, waves, and curls with a ring at the end. No. 2, divide the front hair about three inches from the forehead, from one ear to the other. Take hair pins and twist the hair around the pins instead of putting out and in, as we generally crimp the hair. This turning the hair around the pins will exactly give the desired front coiffure. Carry all the ends of the hair to the top of the head and add two or three pieces of natural-waved hair with the ends curled. No. 3—Take a long false switch and make a small braid, curl the end, twist one with the other and let the end fall behind the ear. Your own hair may be turned into a soft French twist, and the bang loosely curled or "ruffed"—that is, the hair lifted with the brush and not left flat and clinging.

Mantels.

Mantels are carved either simply or much, in all kinds of woods, new mahogany being the most fashionable. They are made with shelves or cupboards at the sides, or odd devices of carving like oriel windows, the top supporting a statue. Many have oven mantels, which go up only high enough to frame a wide, low mirror, or an oxidized silver brass relief, while others reach to the ceiling, with a shingled roof at the top. This is the center for bric-a-brac, and every conceivable effect can be produced by the design of the mantel, with book-cases above, or recesses covered by curtains or plate-glass, and then a melange of bric-a-brac, intended for a hall, had a chimney breast that must have been twelve feet wide. It had various breaks in its outlines, and was all set with tiny iridescent green tiles, forming hearth, back and sides and mantels. Andirons supported logs of wood, and a hob was ready for the kettle, and on the hearth, which was a few inches sunken, were mahogany chairs, the forefeet being longer than the back ones. It made a very complete and handsome hall ornament.

Plumage.

Old Mother Hubbard
Went to the cupboard
To get her poor daughter a gown;
She made it up slattern,
With a sack for a pattern,
And the style spread all over the town.

Pretty linen and mull sets have fine embroidered edges that turn over the edge of the collar and sleeve; the collar is fastened with a gold button, and has a long pin with jeweled head thrust through the dress and collar—a neat and stylish design. Ruches are used inside the neckband of dresses again; and Pompadour ruches are worn by ladies having long, thin necks. The latest of these are crepe lisse, with fringe edges.

Made lace goods were never prettier than this season. Among the novelties may be named collars and collarettes and the long-pointed collars of Pompadour lace. These are in various shapes, some pointed back and front, others with rolling and square corners, and some with a square plastron effect.

The latest bows for the neck are in all the popular shades, with the ends edged with laces used in the made goods; very wide ribbon is used, and the bows long enough to droop; have one bow over and one under the lace-edged ends.

Black, vivid red, tan, and navy blue comprise the four colors now used in hosiery. Black leads.

It is claimed that all dances save the waltz and plain quadrille will soon go out of fashion.

White camels' hair, embroidered in 4-o'clocks and daisies, looks lovely in a tea gown.

As has been stated, jet trimming will be more fashionable than ever this fall.

Many white morning costumes are made with "baby" waists and sash backs.

There is a new lace called Kremlin guipure, of heavy texture, for trimmings.

Ribbons are in demand; very narrow for trimming, very wide for sashes.

Laces that show embossed figures on net backgrounds are shown.

Heads of birds and animals will be used as cloak fastenings.

A novelty in bed spreads is a cover of Turkish toweling.

Autumn dresses are already in the hands of dressmakers.

Poles and rings are still preferred as a curtain cornice.

Household Hints.

Breakfast cake, or coffee cake, as it is commonly called, should be made once in a while. When you are sponging bread, use nearly double the quantity of yeast, and then reserve two large cupfuls of this sponge for the cake. Add to it the well-beaten white of one egg, one cup of sugar, half a cup of butter, and English currants, if inclined. When it is baked, beat the yolk of the egg and wet the top of the cake with it, and sift powdered sugar and cinnamon over the top. Set it in the oven for two or three minutes. If you wish it to be especially rich, put little lumps of butter on the top also.

A delicious dessert is of ice cream and lemon-ice mixed; that is, they are served together in this way; the cream is frozen in a small mould and so is the lemon-ice, and are removed from them and placed on a platter together just before bringing to the table, and the appearance is the same as if they were frozen in the same mould—indeed, this may be done if one is inclined to take trouble and time, for the one in the lower part of the mould must be quite firm before the other can be poured in.

A nice way to can quinces is to first cut them in slices as thin as you usually cut apples for pies. Make a syrup of one cup and a half of sugar to one of water; when it is at the boiling point, or begins to bubble, drop the sliced quinces in; they will cook in a very short time and will be tender and clear. If put up in pint cans it will be found convenient to use them as flavoring for sweet apple sauce, and there is not so much danger of spoiling when opened. The quinces will mold rapidly if exposed to the air after being canned.

A nice way to cook a piece of the round of beef is to line a saucepan with thin slices of bacon, then lay the beef in. Cover it with water. Cover the sauce pan and let the meat cook slowly for several hours, or until it is perfectly tender. As the water boils away add more, so that plenty will be left for gravy. Season highly with salt, peper, celery salt, or curry, and some small onions sliced.

PUT UP YOUR BILL AND SING.

You stupid bird! don't be absurd,
And miss so good a chance;
Will your sweet mate forever wait
Upon that near-by branch?
For every Jack there is a Jill,
And once a year it's spring;
You can't be rash with love or cash—
Put up your bill and sing!

You simple youth! why worship truth,
And ever toil and spin?
Learn cunning ways and claptrap phrase,
And join the side to win.
The right man should the right place get,
For that's the proper thing;
And if you plan to be that man
Put up your bill and sing!

I'm told there's naught that can't be bought
For the proper sort of song—
Votes, honor, place; a handsome face—
The list is pages long.
For every bird there is a note
That stops or starts his wing;
Learn that by rote, puff out your throat,
Put up your bill and sing.

CROOKSTON, MINNESOTA.

The scheme of Jay Gould to sell out the Western Union Telegraph to the United States Government, is not a bad one. There is a disposition to oppose it, but its franchises are invaluable, and the purchase would solve all the difficulties. It will pay at least 4 per cent., and this is ample.

It is more than likely that if business continues to prosper in this country, that another year will see a much greater influx of foreigners than this year has witnessed, for by that time the distinguished foreigners who came over to attend the opening of the Northern Pacific railroad, will have spread far and wide in the old country accounts of the magnificent domain over which they traveled. The total number of immigrants to this country this year is not expected to exceed 350,000, which will be about 100,000 short of last year.

The St. Louis Republican in its comments upon the recent unveiling of the monument to Fielding the first English novelist, happily recalls a prophesy made by the historian Gibbon over 100 years ago, when he said: "The romance of Tom Jones, the exquisite picture of human manners, will outlast the palace of the Escurial and the imperial eagle of the house of Austria." The prophecy is not exactly fulfilled yet, but the time has come when a monument to Felding interests more people and interests them more deeply than any palace or any imperial arms.

The National Cotton Exchange has issued an official statement of the cotton crop of the United States for the year ending August 31, 1883, which shows a total crop of 6,949,756 bales, including receipts at the shipping ports 6.009,612; and shipments by rail routes over land to northern spinners direct from producers, 641,801. The report shows that the southern mills consumed 313,373 bales. The increase in the total crop, compared with the previous year, was 1,493,768. The takings of the United States for the year were 2,073,096 bales, an increase of 108,561.

A great deal of interest attaches to the first successful attempts at sponge cultivation on the American coast. Two specimens of the sheeps wool variety, said to be the finest variety known, have been brought to perfection in Florida, although they were planted in localities unfavorable to their growth. Sponge culture is not protected by law, and sponge-fishermen attack every part of the coast in quest of the material, so that after a culturist has taken every pains to secure fine specimens he is liable to have them taken possession of by those whose sole desire is gain, and from this he has no redress.

It was just twenty-five years ago that gold was first discovered at Cherry Creek, Colorado, where Denver now stands. The news of the discovery was not slow in crossing the plains, and thousands of fortune-hunters immediately started for the new El Dorado. It was "Pike's Peak or bust" with them all. From this discovery dates the settlement of Colorado and the founding of Denver, which has grown to be a beautiful city of 60,000 people. Of the $100,000,000 of gold, silver and copper yielded by the the Rocky Mountains mining region in the past twenty-five years Colorado has produced about two-thirds.

The wonders of the Yellowstone region are said to be rivalled if not excelled by the recent discoveries of Professor Pumpelly's surveying party in Northern Montana. The region explored is around the Upper Marias pass west of the rocky Mountain range, and about 150 miles north of Missoula. Aside from the mountain scenery there are three great natural amphitheaters, in one of which Professor Pumpelly counted twenty-two cascades over 500 feet in height, while on a neighboring mountain is a true glacier, having a frontage of at least a mile, and in some places a fall estimated at 500 feet in heigth. The Northern Pacific runs near enough to these wonders to make them easily accessible to the curious.

The eighth wheat crop has just been harvested in Dakota, and the yield has proved an abundant one, owing to recent rains much larger than was anticipated. During the eight years that wheat has been produced in Dakota there has been nothing like a failure of the crop, and the abundance of the yield and the quality of the grain produced has demonstrated beyond a doubt the fact that the soil of that territory is peculiarly adapted to wheat raising and that it will become one o the great wheat growing sections of the west None of the old names descriptive of the best quality of wheat seemed to fit the Dakota article on account of its excellence and a new name, "No. 1 hard," has been coined for it.

A beauty certainly has a fortune in more ways than one, (to get.) It is stated that M. Arabella Johnson, known as "Number Nine" in the "beauty contest" at Chicago, has sued two Chicago men in the sum of $20,000 for caricaturing her in a cartoon. The plaintiff recites that she is a personage of importance and more than local fame; that she is a neat, genteel and comely-appearing lady, and on account thereof, and of the social position of her family, had always been admitted into the best society of the city of Chicago and the state of Illinois At the solicitation of friends she became a competitor for the royalty of beauty, and was known as "Number Nine," and "on account of her comely, genteel, and dignified appearance" at that contest, she knocked out all of her opponents in four rounds, and was declared by the votes of the spectators the "Queen of Beauty."

The Illinois secretary of state has licensed the incorporation of the Chicago Central elevated railway—capital $5,000,000. The incorporators are W. D. Scott, Charles M. Clark and James W. Sheeny. The line will extend to Riverdale, Englewood, Washington Heights, Norwood Park and Provision suburbs [illegible]

Obituary.

MONMOUTH BEACH. N. J., Sept. 12.—Hugh J Hastings, proprietor of the New York Commercial Advertiser, died this evening at 7 o clock, the result of being thrown from his carriage a few days ago.

Hugh J. Hastings was born in the North of Ireland on Aug. 20, 1820 and came to this country when eight years of age. His family finally settled in Albany, but soon he came to New York, and found a place as an errand boy in a Williams street dry goods store. Then he went back to Albany, restlessly casting about for some way to better his condition. Always an omnivorous reader, he steadily added to his stock of knowledge and began writing for the newspapers. His unique style and clear way of getting at the heart of his subject took at once. In 1840, when twenty years of age, he attached himself to the Albany Daily Atlas as a reporter, and his local items made a hit.

In a few years, however, the longing to branch out for himself took possession of him, and, being at that time possessed of the munificent fortune of $7.50, he saw nothing that stood in the way of his ambition. The result was the Albany Daily Knickerbocker, which was a success almost from the start. Long before he was a voter he had plunged into politics, and in 1840 labored for "Tippecanoe and Tyler too." He was a great admirer of Clay and an early friend of Gen. Taylor, who, when he became president, made him collector of the port of Albany. Mr. Hastings was no believer in Fillmore, and when the latter became president he gave up the collectorship. He was warmly attached to Weed and Seward, and in the wars provoked by those gentlemen Hastings came in for his share of the hard knocks. He was an able, adroit lieutenant, who believed that all is fair in political warfare. Until a year or two ago he has been a steady attendant on political conventions for two score years. In 1852 he was a delegate to the National Whig convention—the last one ever held—voted on every ballot against Fillmore, and was more or less instrumental in making Gen. Scott the candidate of the party. He was also at the birth of the Republican party, and always a friend of the negro. In 1868 he went to New York, having accepted the directorship of the Commercial Advertiser. Thurlow Weed was then editor, but in a short time was obliged to retire, and Hastings purchased a controlling interest in that journal. Through the long senatorial fight at Albany, in 1881, when friend after friend of Mr. Conkling's dropped away, the Commercial continued to stand up for him with a loyalty not often witnessed. He had been a friend of Mr. Conkling for years, was instrumental in securing his election to the United States senate for the first time, but of late years more or less coldness had grown up between them, and at the breaking out of the senatorial fight they had not met more than once or twice in several years. He espoused the cause of Conkling, because he believed New York had been humiliated through her senators; but during the progress of the struggle he had no communication with the senators who were struggling for re-election. He was hospitable to a degree, and had a fine place at Monmouth Beach.

Another Rapist.

Frank J. Blomgren, a Swede, of Wyoming, Minn., was arrested and taken to Rush City on the 12th inst., charged with rape, which, it is alleged, was committed on the 13th day of last June upon the person of Mary Lantgrebe, a German girl twelve years old. Blomgren is a married man, about forty years old, the father of three children, and at present employed as a section hand on the St. Paul & Duluth railroad. The girl's parents live on a farm about two miles east of Wyoming, and are not possessed of an abundance of this world's goods. The facts in the case have just come to light, the parents of the girl claiming that the child would not tell them of it before through fear of Blomgren, whom she says threatened to kill her if she ever divulged it. From what can be learned of the circumstances it seems the child in going to the Wyoming postoffice was met by Blomgren who walked quite a distance with her until they came to a thicket beside the road, into which he forcibly carried her and accomplished his purpose. Through fear she said nothing to her parents. Her mother, however, a short time after discovered blood on her underclothing and questioned her strictly in reference to it, but she could get nothing from her. A short time ago, however, she told the horrid story to a neighbor woman for whom she had occasionally worked, and friends of the family caused the arrest of Blomgren as stated above. He strenuously denies his guilt and asserts that it is a put up job upon him

The Marine Hospital Service.

The annual report of the marine hospital service for the past fiscal year will soon be ready for consideration by the secretary of the treasury. It is understood that no recommendation for new hospitals will be made except one for New York city. The past year has been very satisfactory, over 40,000 patients being treated at the various institutions. The treatment of the epidemic diseases which has been under the management of this bureau for the past two seasons will be thoroughly reviewed. For this work $100,000 for each of the two past fiscal years was appropriated, but up to June 30 but $51,000 of the $200,000 had been expended in both seasons. In spite of the vast immigration from the old world infected with small pox and cholera, so strict has been the surveillance that no introduction of these diseases has been accomplished by the movement of people from contagious localities.

A Few California Curiosities.

As a west-bound train passed Cape Horn a large party of strangers crowded out on the platform and loudly expressed their dissatisfaction at the scenery.

As they returned to their seats to enjoy a jolly good grumble, entirely oblivious of the indignant glances of the native passengers, a meek-looking, gentle-voiced journalist from 'Frisco approached from the other end of the car and volunteered to give the tourists some valuable facts concerning the country.

The next morning the journalist was informed by the porter that a committee of gentlemen wished to see him in the baggage car. As he entered the latter he found a dozen travelers, all native and to the manner born waiting to receive him, hat in hand. The spokesman advanced and said:

"You are the party who was giving those globe trotters in the rear sleeper some pointers about the coast, I believe.'

"I am, sir," said the quilldriver, modestly.

"You told them, I understand," continued the chairman, "that Mount Shasta was 76,000 feet high."

"The same."

"You divulged the well known fact that trains on this road were often detained fours days by herds of buffalo, and that they frequently have to use a Gatling gun on the cow catcher to prevent the locomotive being pushed off the track by the grizzly bears?"

"Yes, sir."

"You farther acquainted them with the circumstances that the Digger Indians live to the average age of 204, and and that the rarefication of the air on the plains is such that an ordinary pin looks like a telegraph pole at the distance of forty-two miles?"

"I think I wedged that in," responded the newspaper man.

"And we are informed they all made a memorandum of your statement that at the Palace Hotel an average of two waiters per day were shot by the guests for bringing cold soup—eh?"

"They did."

"And, finally we believe that you are the originator of that beautiful—that b-e-a-utiful—er—fact regarding that fallen redwood tree up at Mariposa—I mean that hollow one into which the six-horse stage drives, and comes out of a knot-hole 162 feet further along?'

"I told them all about it."

"Just so! just so, said the committee man, grasping the patriot's hand and producing a well-filled buckskin bag, and I am instructed by this committee of your fellow countrymen to present you with this slight token of our appreciation of the noble manner in which you have vindicated the honor of our native land."

And as he left the car they gave him a cheer that nearly shook the train off the rails.—San Francisco Post.

Near Harrington, Del., a locomotive and three cars passed over a child as it lay sleeping between the rails. The child was but slightly hurt.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

Washington News Notes.

The commissioners of pensions finds that the average yearly value of a pension is $105, and the average date at which arrearages began to accrue is the year 1864. The number of claims now pending which included arrearages is 148,813. If one-half o these be allowed, the total amount required to pay them will be $12,137,335. This is, of course, in addition to all sums heretofore paid under the arrearages act. There are also 95,692 claims now pending which do not involve arrearages. If 50 per cent. of these be allowed, the annual demand upon the treasury to meet them will be $5,023,835. The present pension list calls for $32,000,000 a year. Considering all the claims now unadjusted to be settled, and one-half of them allowed, the sum required for the entire pension list would be $44 836,565. Should no further claims be filed and allowed, the amount required would, of course, diminish annually.

The evil of absenteeism in the departments continues to grow under the liberal construction by Secretary Folger of the law regulating annual vacations and sick leave for government employes. Acting on the advice of subordinates, who assured the secretary that it had always been the practice to allow pay in case of sickness, besides giving thirty days annual leave, Mr. Folger directed accordingly. The result of this is seen in the large number of employes who report themselves sick on the slightest indisposition or fancy. It has been suggested that in view of the ease with which it is possible to obtain a physician's certificate to prove sickness, a department doctor would have to be employed to protect the service.

The action of Secretary Teller in denying the application of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba road relative to certain proceedings in connection with pending homestead applications is not a matter of great importance, as it refers merely to the subject of practice in contested land cases, and has no bearing whatever upon the land titles. In these contested cases it is required that each case shall be heard separately at the local land office and then taken to Washington for final hearing and adjudication. The officers of the road desired, in order to save time and trouble, that the practice should be so modified as to admit of the sending of a number of cases to Washington, and having the hearing thereon at the same time. Secretary Teller's denial merely leaves matters in the same position as they have been.

It is understood that Corean embassy bears credentials of such character that a legation may be established at Washington, the members of the party remaining as minister, secretary and attaches. So far as made public, the programme of the ambassadors is not decided upon further than the visit to New York and Boston, after which, it is understood, they will return to Washington and remain some months, if not permanently. The only other foreign country to which an embassey was ever sent from Corea was Japan, and the mission resulted in the establishment of a legation there.

Secretary Teller has denied an application of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad to have certified for his action certain proceedings relative to pending homestead applications for lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the road. The company objected to the action of the commissioner of the general land office ordering a hearing in certain cases, and claimed that the lands in question, being within its grant and selected by it, are not subject to entry. The secretary holds that the matter of ordering a hearing to ascertain the particular fact is within the discretion of the commissioner, and should not be interfered with.

A rumor is afloat in Milwaukee to the effect that the Chicago & Northwestern Railway company is quietly working to get a foothold on the west side of the city, near the old La Crosse depot and the present freight depot of the Milwaukee & St. Paul railway. The movement is made to secure a portion of the freights now given to the St. Paul folks, who enjoy to a certain extent a practical monopoly of beer and flour freights, owing to the nearness of the freight depot to the breweries and mills.

In a recent report to the national department of agriculture, R. H. Young, who is the department agent in Minnesota, stated that having received advices from more than 350 correspondents he was confirmed in his belief that the corn crop of the state was irretrievably damaged by the late frosts. He estimates that 42 per cent. of an average crop will be gathered nearly all in, a damaged condition. This would give a total crop of about 7,000,000, bushels. The same gentleman estimates that 135,000 acres of wheat (about 5 per cent. of the total acreage) was completely devastated during the past season by cyclones, tornadoes and hail storms and fixes the total crop of wheat for the state at 35,000,000 bushels.

The Twenty-first will move from Vancouver barracks, and the Tenth from Fort Wayne, Ind., and Detroit, Mich. The exchange will be made by detachments, as it will be difficult to procure sufficient rolling stock to make the transfer over so long a line at once, and it will probably take nearly two months to complete the movement.

The Criminal Record.

A proposed gigantic land steal, involving several millions of dollars worth of United States redwood timber lands, has been brought to light. The lands are situated in the northern part of California, and comprise the most valuable redwood timber on the coast. An application for possession, prepared and signed by dummies, had been filed with the government authorities here, it being alleged that the government officials acted in collision with the parties engineering the scheme. If the promoters succeed they will control one-sixth the total timber supply of the state. Affidavits are now being filed proving frauds, but the United States grand jury propose to investigate the subject.

Personal News Paragraphs.

The friends of Paul Vandervoort, ex-commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, recently removed from the position of postal clerk at [illegible], claim that his case was misrepresented to the postmaster general. They declare that his absence from duty complained of was during the administration of Postmaster General Howe, and through an explicit understanding with the latter that he was to hold his position and be allowed to travel in the interest of the Grand Army. Another charge was that he went to Soda Springs Idaho, after the Denver meeting, without the knowledge of the department. Vandervoort writes that this is not true, because he was there on postal business. It is reported that Senator Manderson and Congressman Valentine of Nebraska, Senator Hogan and others, have written to the president strongly in Vandervoort's behalf, and that Senator Van Wyck and ex-Senator Saunders wrote to the postmaster general, complaining of his neglect of duty. An effort will be made to secure his reinstatement.

London Cable: Canon Wilberforce has made a vigorous attack upon the holding, by the established church, of its immense property in public houses, a number of the most prosperous gin palaces being maintained under its direct administration. The church in London has long since admitted its inability to deal with the spiritual needs of the poor, but a recent report of the committee which inquired into its public house property shows that it has no scruple or difficulty in maintaining liquor traffic. Strenuous efforts have kept this scandal quiet and prevented the impairment of church revenues, which the application of a remedy would entail. It would appear, however, that the facts are about to see the light, and that a vigorous agitation has been begun and will be efficiently prosecuted.

As marchioness of Salisbury she was much disliked, but in an official station her peculiarities are more widely offensive.

The National Guard.

During the preparations for the Villard reception a question of authority arose between Col. Bend and Lieut Col. Johnson, of the First regiment, N. G. S. M. This misunderstanding arose in connection with clashing orders issued in regard to the parade in St. Paul and Minneapolis. As it has provoked some comment in military circles, the matter has been brought to the official notice of Gov. Hubbard, who, to settle permanently all such questions which may arise in the future, has caused to be issued the following order, which has been promulgated by Col. Bend, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST REGIMENT, N. G. S. M., ST. PAUL, Sept. 13, 1883.—General Order No. 11: The following order from general headquarters is hereby promulgated: State of Minnesota, adjutant general's office, St. Paul, Sept. 12, 1883.—General orders No. 4: The commanding officers of the several regiments of the Minnesota National Guard are authorized to order drills, parades and schools of instruction at such times and places as they may deem necessary, and all orders relating thereto issued by regimental commanders must be observed. Second—No company will be allowed to leave its proper headquarters under arms without the authority of the commander of the regiment to which it belongs, except when acting under the orders of the commander-in-chief.

By order of the commander-in-chief.

A. C. HAWLEY, Adjutant General.

According to the decision of his excellency, the commander-in-chief, as contained in the foregoing order, some officers of this regiment have lately been guilty of disobedience of orders; some of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, in inciting others to disobey orders; and some of conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, in holding meetings in which the action of their superiors was criticised, and then making public the result of those meetings. Respect toward superiors and prompt obedience to orders are the first requisites of a soldier, and when officers set a bad example, what can be expected of the men? A court martial would certainly visit the offenders in question with condign punishment; but, as it is the opinion of the commanding officer that they transgressed partly through ignorance of their duties and partly through the bad advice of some who should have known better, no further notice will be taken of what has occurred, and they will be expected to make amends in the future for their past errors.

The captain of each company in the regiment will cause a copy of this order to be served at once on each member of his command, and will post a copy for thirty days on the bulletin board in the company armory.

By order of Col. W. B. Bend.

W. J SONNEN, First Lieut. and Adjt.

Give It to the Girls.

Give your daughters a thorough education. Teach them to cook and prepare the food of the household. Teach them to wash, to iron, and to darn stockings, to sew on buttons, and to make their own dresses. Teach them to make bread, and that a good kitchen lessens the doctor's account. Teach them that he only lays up money whose expenses are less than his income, and that all grow poor who have to spend more than they receive. Teach them that a calico dress paid for fits better than a silken one unpaid for. Teach them that a full healthy face displays greater luster than fifty consumptive beauties. Teach them to purchase, and to see that the account corresponds with the purchase. Teach them good common sense, self-trust, self-help and industry. Teach them that an honest mechanic in his working dress is a better object of esteem than a dozen haughty, finely-dressed idlers. Teach them gardening and the pleasures of nature. Teach them, if you can afford it, music, painting, etc., but consider them as secondary objects only. Teach them that a walk is more salutary than a ride in a carriage. Teach them to reject with disdain all appearances and to use only "Yes" or "No" in good earnest. Teach them that happiness in matrimony depends neither on external appearances nor on wealth, but on the man's character.—Philosopher.

CARRIED OVER NIAGARA.

Remarkable Self-Possession of a Man Doomed to Sure Death.

Buffalo Commercial Advertiser.

At sundown yesterday a man was carried over the falls. Who he was is not known. His dress and appearance indicated respectability, and after he got into the rapids his self possession was extraordinary. His boat was a very good one, decked over the bow, and I should think would carry three or four tons. No other than a person unacquainted with the current above the rapids would venture so near them. I was on the head of Goat Island when I first discovered the boat, then near half a mile below the foot of Navy Island, and nearly two miles above the falls. There seemed to be two in the boat. It was directed toward the American shore—the wind blowing from the shore, and the sail was still standing. Being well acquainted with the river, I regarded the position of the boat as extraordinary and hazardous, and watched it with intense anxiety. Soon I discovered the motion of an oar, and, from the changing direction of the boat, concluded it had but one. While constantly approaching nearer and nearer the rapids I could discover it was gaining the American shore, and by the time it had got near the first fall the rapids, half a mile above Goat Island, it was directly above the island. There it was turned up the river, and for some time the wind kept it nearly stationary. The only hope seemed to be to come directly to Goat Island, and whether I should run half a mile to give an alarm, or remain to assist in case the boat attempted to make the island, was a question of painful doubt. But soon the boat was again turned toward the American shore. Then I was certain it must go down the American rapids. I ran for the bridge, rallied a man at the tollgate, and we ran to the main bridge in time to see the boat just before it got to the first large fall in the rapids. Then I saw but one man—he standing at the stern with his oar changing the course of the boat down the current, and as it plunged over he sat down. I was astonished to see the boat rise, with the mast and sail standing, and the man again erect directing the boat toward the shore. As he came to the next and to each succeeding fall he sat down, and then would rise and apply his oar in the intermediate current. Still there was hope that he would come near enough the pier to jump, but in a moment it was gone. Another, that he might jump upon the rock near the bridge, but the current dashed him from it under the bridge, breaking the mast. Again he rose on the opposite side. Taking his boat toward the main shore, he cried:

"Had I better jump from the boat?" We could not answer, for either seemed certain destruction, Within a few rods of the falls the boat struck a rock, turned over and lodged. He appeared to crawl from under it, and swam with the oar in his hand till he went over the precipice. Without the power to render assistance, for half an hour watching a strong man struggling with every nerve for life, yet doomed with almost the certainty of destiny to an immediate and awful death, still hoping with every effort for his deliverance, caused an intensity of excitement I pray God never again to experience.

What He Held.

Mr. Tooter Williams astonished the Thompson street poker club Saturday night by raising Mr. Gus Johnson sixty-five cents when that gentleman opened the last jack-pot of the evening. Mr. Johnson showed up two small pairs and percipitately fell out; but Mr. Canteleupe Smith stood the raise and drew four cards. Mr. Williams stood pat. After the draw Mr. Smith skinned his cards, breathed very hard, and bet a postage stamp and a battered cent. Mr. Williams promptly raised him a dollar and forty cents. Mr. Smith hesitated, but finally drew forth his wallet.

"Look hyar, yo' coon, what yo' got dat yo're gettin' so brash?"

"Yo' fine out ef yo' bet dat dollah fohty—jes' yo' see," retorted Mr. Williams, evidently getting excited.

"Yo'se done rise de tar outen me too offen. Now, what yo' got?" said Mr. Smith, putting his money into the pot.

Mr. Williams looked disconcerted.

"I—I'se got a small king full," he faltered.

"King full's good," said Mr. Smith.

"But I ain't got it," said Mr. Williams.

"What has yo, got, den?" said Mr. Smith.

"I'se got three queens."

"Three queens is good," said Mr. Smith.

"But I ain't got 'em," said Mr. Williams.

"What has yo' got, den?" queried Mr. Smith, growing a little impatient.

"I'se got two par," said Mr. Williams.

"Dat's good," said Mr. Smith.

"But I hain't got 'em."

"Oh, come now nigger, what has you got?"

"I'se got one par."

"Dat's good."

"But I haint got it," said Mr. Williams, whose situation was growing perilous.

"Lans' stars, nigger, quit your foolin!' What has you got?"

Mr. Williams slowly skinned his cards.

'I—I hain't got nuffin."

Progress in Ireland.

PHILADELPHIA, Special Telegram, Sept. 17.—In a letter to The Press Michael Davitt says:

At present we are in full swing with the National league demonstration in Ireland, and in the work of carrying out the somewhat extensive programme of that organization. There can be no surer test of the real progress that is being made in the Irish popular movement than is to be found in the opinions which Englishmen and English papers are passing upon the efforts and plans of the National party. Tourists visiting Ireland have seen the horrible mud dens in which laborers and small cotters have been compelled to reside. More than 1,000,000 of our people are dwelling in cabins of this description. The laborers' dwellings act is intended to remedy a portion of this evil, and the National league is taking immediate steps to have its provisions put into working order as soon as possible. To stimulate an outlay of capital in the construction of useful lines in districts where no railways exist, the treasury gives a guarantee of 2 per cent interest for a few years on all investments in the undertaking. With this encouragement there is every likelihood of a number of such lines being laid down and a deal of labor thereby provided. The second part of the tramway bill deals with and provides the sum of $250,000 for the carrying out of a scheme of migration. A large company is already being formed, and capital is expected to be forthcoming for the working of this scheme. If the experiment turns out to be a successful one a powerful check will be given to emigration, and most of the land now running to waste will be brought under cultivation and the material prosperity of the country greatly improved thereby. Evictions are still being carried out in consequence of nonpayment of rack rent. A parliamentary paper just issued shows the number of people who have been dispossessed of their holdings throughout Ireland during the quarter ending June 30. The province of Munster heads the list with a record of 434 families, or 2,327 persons. Connaught comes next with 380 families, comprising 2,008 individuals. In Leinster there were 162 families evicted, comprising 721 persons. In Ulster, 271 families, or 1,103 persons were thrown out. I give these figures and facts to show our friends in America how much tyranny can yet be exercised by Irish landlordism, and the existence of the power to thus deprive our people of their homes, and point how much work still remains to be done before that tyranny is stamped out. In nearly all of these evictions arrears of rack rent constituted the crime for which these "sentences of death," as Mr. Gladstone once termed Irish evictions, were inflicted.

The Price of Wheat.

Heretofore the Duluth market has always been the best, and farmers who have sold in that market have realized more for their wheat than those who have sold in the Minneapolis market. The impression has always been that if wheat was put into the elevators along this line it must of necessity go to the Minneapolis market but we have been told that such is not necessarilly the case; that a farmer can haul his wheat to any elevator on the line, take his receipts therefor and order his wheat shipped to Duluth and that the wheat must be shipped there. In this case it would pay our farmers to watch the Duluth market closely and when wheat reaches a satisfactory point ship to Duluth. If the experience of the past few years is any criterion to judge by, the Duluth market will be from five to ten cents per bushel better than the Minneapolis market, and this means thousands of dollars in the aggregate; thousands of dollars that instead of going into the hands of speculating sharks ought to go to our home merchants to liquidate those little store bills with which every farmer is familiar. Natural causes render the Duluth market the best and it is also a fact that the grading there is not brought down so fine as at Minneapolis both of which render the Duluth market decidedly the market for our farmers. Our advice to farmers is to try the Duluth market once.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

The Red Lake Falls Messenger of the 13th inst contains a diagram of Kretzschmar's race and dam, just completed. The Messenger says:—[Work commenced on the excavation for the race on January 2d 1883, Jos. Pattenaud having been given the contract for the excavation. Much delay was experienced from the necessity of blasting the surface earth which was frozen to a depth of from five to seven feet.

The supervision of the timber work, on race, and dam was from the first under the supervision of A. S. Hanscomb, who has labored faithfully to carry out successfully Mr. Kretschmar's plans.

On the 11th of April, the bulkhead and wings at the east end of the race were so far completed as to allow of putting the gates in position. On the 28th of June the last pile in the race was driven, and on the 5th of July that portion of the undertaking was completed. The driven of piles for the dam commenced under contractor Pattenaud, July 2d, and the last pile on the wings of the east bulkhead went in about a week ago.

The race, from the east bulkhead, to the lower end of the penstock and wheel pit is 750 feet long, by 29 feet 7 inches in width, clear of timbering. At the head the depth is 13 feet, while at the lower end it is 12 feet to floor of penstock, and 16 to bottom of wheel pits. There are openings for three mammoth turbine wheels, of which one will be put in at once, and the others as fast as needed. The race is crossed midway by a substantial wagon bridge, and several foot bridges span it at various places.

The dam, which is straight from bank to bank, is 208 feet long. From the west end, it is 40 feet to the west wall of sluice and logway which is 33 feet wide in the clear, and 16 feet long from gate at upper end to foot of apron. At the east end is a sluice way 11 feet wide in the clear. The top of the dam, except over the main sluice, is level, and a bridge wide enough for two teams, made moveable so as to allow its temporary removal when ice goes out in spring, is thrown over it so as to leave 16 inches clear space between top of dam and lower bridge timbers. An arched span covers the sluice way, the lower ends of the timbers of which are 36 inches above highest point of gates. The arch is so arranged that it can be raised in spring or at any other time, some four feet higher, to allow passage of ice, logs, etc. The apron on the upper side of dam is ⅓ pitch while the lower apron is ¼ pitch.

The top of the dam is 13 feet 10 inches above the original bed of the river, 9 feet 4 inches above original water level. The depth of water in the pond above the dam, when completed, and gates shut, will be 9 feet 4 inches. A large portion of the low ground east of the river will be submerged when the pond is full, and will make a fine boomage ground, cut off at the north by the massive embarkment now being made to connect the east end of the bridge with the roads in the proposed new addition north of the river, and which, with the completion of the bridge for public use, will make of this an important thoroughfare.

There are 890 piles in the race and 412 in the dam and wings. A force averaging over 20 men have been engaged steadily since the commencement of work in January, in addition to teamsters, blacksmiths, etc. The aggregate cost of the improvements up to the present time is not far from $45,000. The power furnished by the race was at first intended for 1,000 horse power, but we are informed that with a change in the original plans the amount is very much more, one gentleman claiming it is nearly double. The power at the east end of the dam is 125 horse power, using only one wheel. The actual working capacity of the dam and race can easily be increased to a material extent by changes easy to make at any time.

The thorough completion of the dam proper, will yet require two or three weeks to finish, but Mr. Kretzschmar may well be congratulated on the practical accomplishment of an enterprise that very few men, even if possessed of the means, would have had courage, ambition, energy and foresight enough to undertake, to say nothing of completing. Few men are public spirited enough to assume the risks taken by him in spite of opposition and ridicule, and our citizens have reason to be proud of him, as well as to rejoice in his success which is theirs alos.

The increased number of stock of all kinds in and around Red Lake Falls, will cause a largely increased demand for not only fodder but bedding. We noticed last fall the farmers in this section burned the greater part of their straw. This is a shameful waste; it is simply burning up money. By cutting and steaming straw stock will do nearly as well on it as on hay, and if ground feed is added will do better. When farmers have no special winter work the labor amounts to nothing. The hay crop can thus be saved and marketed. Save your straw.

The time that is left after stacking and until the ground freezes up, you can devote to fall plowing and save money. But, beyond all, when you plow, plow deep. The experience of this year teaches that all farms where plowing was deep have given better crops than any others, and were not half so much affected by drouth. If you plowed four inches last fall, go six or seven this fall. It will pay.

Carl Kretzschmar does not make speeches, it is true, but there is a score of good speeches in the grip of his hand and his genial smile.

Mrs. Kretzschmar was among the most deeply interested spectators at the race Monday, and it afforded general pleasure to see her there sufficiently well to enjoy the occasion.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

The citizens of Fisher, and the great number of others whose business calls them to this place, will regret to learn that "mine host" of the Windsor, Mr. S. R. Harlow, has left us to take charge of a large new hotel at Sanborn, Dak. All join in wishing him good luck.

We learn that a Sunday school was organized on Sabbath last in the new school house in Thomas Benson's neighborhood, Bigland township, by S. N. Millard, missionary of the American Sunday School Union. Jason Ames was chosen superintendent. The school will be held in the school house at 3 o'clock p. m.

A very serious if not fatal accident occurred on Sunday last on the Rockwood farm. While the hired man (colored) was doing some chores about the barn the wind, which blew very hard all day Sunday, dislodged a heavy plank, which fell with great force on the head of the unfortunate man, inflicting injuries it is feared may prove fatal. He now lies very low and in a paralyzed condition.

Surveyor-Boy And President.

Young People's Life of George Washington. By William M. Thayer. Elzevir ebition, 466 pages, Brevier type, leaded. With illustrations. Extra cloth, 60 cents; half Russia, red edges, 65 cents.

No other name has received such universal homage as that of Washington. Edward Everett spoke but the verdict of the world when he pronounced Washington, "of all the men that have ever lived, the greatest of good men, and the best of great men. Frederick the Great, whose own name ranks with those of Alexander, Cæsar, and Napoleon, declared his deeds to be "the most brilliant of any in the annals of military achievement."

Whether as school boy, surveyor boy, Indian fighter member of Congress, Commander-in-Chief, or President, his life was full of striking incident, and ever an example to thrill and inspire any youth whose heart pulsates with the free and vigorous blood of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Mr. Thayer, the author of the present work, just published, has proved by his world-famous lives of Lincoln, "From Pioneer Home to the White House," and of Garfield, "From Log Cabin to the White House," a writer whose pen is wonderfully suited to its theme. He writes with an enthusiasm worthy of his subject; with vividly drawn pictures of the times and scenes through which Washington passed, quoting the language of his friends and contemporaries, and crowding the pages with appropriate illustrative anecdotes, he makes the times and the characters seem present realities to the reader. His book will at once be accepted as one of the best of the lives of Washington, not for young people only, but for older folks as well. It is not sold by dealers, but only direct by the publisher, who will send a 100-page descriptive catalogue of his attractive and famously cheap publications free on request. John B. Alden, publisher, 18 Vesey St., New York.

Run to Earth.

Grand Forks Herald:—[A brockle faced tramp who was seen hanging around East Grand Forks yesterday, was arrested last evening by officer Scott and locked up on the charge of stealing a coat. A young man named Joseph Arceneau who is employed in the Acme Hotel at East Grand Forks hung his coat up in the office of the hotel and went in to supper. On returning, the coat was missing, and, on making the case known to Deputy Sheriff Dwyer, suspicion was at once directed to the strange tramp. As the tramp was not to be found on the other side of the river, it was decided to visit this city and reconnoitre. The tramp was found in a Third street saloon, about taking a drink, with the stolen coat on his back. He was at once arrested, and will be taken to Crookston to-day for examination. There is no excuse whatever for theft, especially at the present time, as men can secure employment at $3,50 per day, their board included, and farmers are anxious to get all the help possible.

Polk County Journal.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON. THURSDAY. SEPT. 20.

Geo. F. Whitcomb, of Alexandria, took in the fair last week.

The Argyle Banner has a new dress and is becoming a lively local paper.

Wm. Marin is building a big granary on his farm, to accommodate his large crop.

H. Marquard, a cigar-maker of Wabasha, was in the city last week. He may decide to locate here.

John B. Murphy representing the wholesale liquor house of John W. Enright was in the city last week.

The Argyle Banner says that ten thousand bushels of wheat have been received at that point for shipment this fall.

L. B. Decker drops the quill and the scissors in the editorial department of Marshall County Leader, and J. J. McLennan succeeds him.

Peter Tibesar, of Kellogg, Minnesota, looked over Sampson's Woodland Addition, and being pleased with our city and its prospects, concluded to purchase a site and erect a large hotel.

Wm. Marin takes the field this fall with two threshing machines, a wood burner and a straw burner. "Joe" thinks he is the lad what is able to thresh all the farmers in Polk County—one at a time.

John Amundson is building a big addition to his granary on his Fairfax farm. This is a general complaint this fall. Everybody has such large crops that they are obliged to enlarge their storage capacity.

Lewis Lamb, the new railroad mail agent between this city and Devils Lake City, came in on his first trip last Monday. Mr. Lamb will make Crookston his headquarters. There was a heavy mail requiring every moment of time. He was accompanied by W. S. Fowler of Michigan City, D. T.

On Saturday the 8th Childs & Co., threshed, on their Riverside farm 1,686 bushels of wheat with a Minnesota Chief thresher. On Monday, the 10th, from 10 a. m., they threshed 1,239 bushels, on Tuesday 1,505 and on Wednesday 1,590 bushels. The machine used was larger than common machines made specially to order. This is the best record we have ever seen made in the county.

The Polk County Fair.

BELTRAMI, Sept. 11th 1883.

EDITOR JOURNAL:—We received the other day a copy of the rules and regulations of the Northwestern Exposition, to be held from Sept. 11th to 14th. We had previously heard that Polk County was to have a fair this fall and had been pleased to think that we should see a good exhibit of the products of Polk County industries, an exhibition which we should be glad to show to strangers and visitors who might be induced to settle in our county. We had hoped that the managers and directors of the fair would do what they could to encourage our farmers, stock raisers, manufacturers and merchants to bring the best specimens of their products and thus demonstrate that Polk County has natural resources that make abundant return for capital and labor; such a fair and such an exhibition could not fail to be of material benefit to the county. However, on looking over the premium list we must confess that we were surprised to see the great inducements offered therein to the farmer and manufacturer; we are told in this list that the farmer who attends the fair, pays his railroad and hotel expenses and his admission to the grounds, and takes with him two bushels of wheat, will, if his wheat should by chance be awarded the first premium receive the princely sum of $1.00, 10 per cent. of which is retained by the association for their liberality. If Polk County ever becomes wealthy and populous it must be to a great extent due to the wheat raising industry of the county, the managers of the fair evidently know this and thus do all they can to foster and encourage this branch of industry, this premium might be sufficient were the society poor, but we notice that they have $500 to give to the best lady rider, and $125 to the best base ball clubs. The farmer who has the best span of draft horses is to receive $9.00, while a purse of $500 is made up for the imported trotting horses who win in the "free to all." Yet without the draft horse our country must have been an undeveloped wilderness to-day and all but sportsmen and gamblers could well do without trotting horses and even they might find a substitute. The lady who makes the best bread is to receive a prize ribbon, while the lady who shows off to the best advantage on horse back receives $25. The whole of the premium list is in keeping with the above, to sum it all up the association advertises $5,000 in premiums to be competed for, and out of that amount less than one hundred dollars in the aggregate is to be given for all the products of the farm, the workshop or industries and enterprises that would in any way further the interests of the country. We believe the farmers of the county would be willing to take their products to the fair and do their best to make it a success even if they received nothing for their pains, but to have Indians, base ball players, marksmen, and trotting horses receive 98 per cent. of the premiums which must be contributed by the producing clases, certainly does not have a tendency to make them admire the fair or its management. We hope that in the future some small part of the attention and the money may be given to farmers, if not, let us organize an agricultural fair.

Yours, D. T. HERRIOT.

Notice.

I desire to inform the public that although the firm of Haseltine Bros., has dissolved, I shall continue the nursery business on the old grounds, in Crookston, Minn. That E. W. Haseltine who has been one of the firm has his share of nursery stock growing on my grounds in Crookston which he is selling out, but has no nursery as he has stated in his advertisement. All orders sent to my address will be promptly filled. Correspondence solicited.

Most Respectfully,
[20-tf]. F. T. HASELTINE.

N. B.

To all whom it may concern:

The old Nursery is on Mrs. Devis' ground instead of F. T. Haseltine's as above stated, and I am paying rent for the use and growth of my share of Nursery stocks upon said grounds, from this date until I am requested to remove my stock from her grounds next year to another plot for a Nursery. I will sell to all parties coming here for trees and shrubs at a much reduced rate. Residence one block north of court house. Correspondence solicited.

Very reswectfully,

County News.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Now that snake root season is about over, a large number of our Indians have gone up to the Red Lake to get out pine for Crocker & Cundy. A large drive exclusively pine logs will soon be started from Red Lake for this point.

Will Sorsoliel was unable to attend the fair this week, on account of the advent into his family of a very handsome baby girl. We wish the young lady a long and happy life.

Bears are evidently a good crop this year. Mr. Reuben Smith killed a large black one near Charly Wood's house, a few miles north of town last evening. Bruin was enjoying a repast of wild cherries when Mr. S. brought him down with a rifle ball. He weighed about 250 lbs.

The report reaches us of the shooting of an Indian on the reservation this morning. It seems, that two Indians started in pursuit of a bear which had been seen near their camp. The bear ran into some very thick brush and the Indians separated and started into the brush from different points. As they came near to each other, one of the Indians mistook the other for the bear and fired a full charge of buck shot into his face and neck. Mr. A. E. Ranson has just gone up to extract the shot and do whatever else he can to relieve his suffering but the Indians express little hope of his recovery.

For some days past, a large black bear has been seen prowling around the outskirts of the town. On Friday evening last, just after sundown, Mr. Bruin put in an appearance in the garden of Mr. K. O. Gigstad, and commenced helping himself to such garden sass as best suited his taste. Mrs. G. was alone in the house at the time, and seeing his bearship, became frightened, and closed the door of the house, which had been standing ajar. Mr. Bruin, thinking probably, that his company was not desired, walked slowly into the woods, in the rear of the house. Mr. Gigstad informed our local Nimrods of the bear's visit, who started out early on Saturday morning in pursuit, but after searching for him for an hour or two, came to the conclusion that he had taken his departure. One of the company got a large goose however, which was some recompense for rising at 4 o'clock a. m.

The Original Tennesseeans are Coming

Donavin's Original Tennesseeans, Colored Concerters, who were organized by their present manager in 1873, under the control and auspices of the Freedman's Aid Society, and the same company that so materially assisted in singing up Central College at Nashville, Tenn., are to give one of their novel entertainment in Ericsson's Hall Sep., 27th.

They ask the people to judge by their testimonials, among which we notice one direct from Nashville and signed by the best men of that city, whether they are not far superior to the many insignificant "jubilee-singing" troupes that have perambulated the State with poor printing and no testimonials at all, comparatively. These "Tennesse Jubilee Singers" were frauds. The Tenesseeans are not "jubilee singers" but are thorough cultivated musicians, and give a varied entertainment.

Choice Literature.

This, one of the choicest of the literary magazines, begins a new volume with the September issue, and introduces new, larger and very handsome type. Among the valuable articles of the number are: "Luther," by James Anthony Froude; "State Socialism and the Nationalization of the Land," by Henry Fawcett, the well-known writer on Political Economy and a present member of the British Cabinet; "The Saints of Islam," by W. H. Lilly; "The Analogies of Sailing," by P. G. Hamerton; a very interesting review of the recently published "Autobiography of Renan;" also a number of other articles, less notable, but hardly less important, from eminent English and European writers. This magazine is not sold by the trade, but only by the publisher direct, at a price marvellously low, considering that it contains more literature of the very highest class than any even of the four-dollar monthlies,—ten cents a number, or $1 a year. Norman County Banner:—On Friday night or Saturday morning last, a young man 28 years of age, named J. E. Johnson, and living about 6 miles south-east of this place in the town of Rockwell, committed suicide by hanging himself. His body was found Saturday morning. A day or two previous to the hanging, Johnson was in Ada trying to sell his place, offering to take $400 for a good tree claim. The reason he gave for wanting to sell at this figure was that he had been told that certain parties intended to "jump" his claim, and that he wanted to save what he could. The young man had complied strictly to law and had no reason to fear, but, it is said, that at times he was insane, which probably accounts for his paying attention to idle rumors; and also for the suicide. His remains were buried Monday.

The Millers vs. the Railroads.

Speaking about the fight between the Minneapolis Millers Association and the principal railroad lines leading to Chicago, the Chicago Tribune says:

"The dispatch from St. Paul giving the particulars of the flour fight between the millers at Minneapolis and St. Paul and the railroads caused considerable comment in Chicago. It is understood by some parties interested here in the grain and flour movement that the millers of that section are in great trouble. They have had a practical monopoly of the wheat business in Minnesota for years past, either by an understanding with the railroad officials or otherwise, by which means they have been practically able to dictate prices to farmers. Under the stimulus of the excessive profits permitted by that arrangement, and by the system of through freights which gave them peculiar transportation facilities, as compared with millers in this section, they have grown rich and built up a vast milling system there, which is now so great as to have become top heavy. The milling facilities have already outgrown the current demand for consumption, and in order to keep the mills going it has been found necessary to establish agencies broadcast all over the East and Europe. It is said also that the mills have been grouped together in such a way that the insurance men have taken the alarm and are unwilling to write policies on the property except at rates, which are variously stated by outsiders as from 5 to 8 per cent. per annum. On the heels of this comes the extraordinary development of the wheat raising industry in the far Northwest. The trouble with the Minneapolis millers is that they cannot control that wheat, and the demand of the owners of that grain for a market at fair transportation rates bids fair to kill off the combination. The arrangements, as they are understood by people in Chicago, are that the wheat of the Northwest can go to Duluth and reach the seaboard at a price which makes it cheap as compared with Minneapolis flour; but, more than that, the millers of Rochester, N. Y., are able to take the wheat, grind it, and supply the flour to the people of the seaboard and of Europe at a cheaper price than the wheat could be laid down on the other side to be ground by the English millers. The Rochester millers are already taking certain kinds of wheat from Chicago for the purpose of mixing with this Duluth wheat, and there is reason to think that about all the export demand for the last week or two has been simply the filling of those orders from the Rochester millers. They can take the relatively cheap grades of wheat from Chicago and mix them with the good wheat from the Northwest, and make a flour which is very much cheaper than anything that can be made by the Minneapolis millers from Minnesota wheat, on what would otherwise be equal terms. When against this is set down the large cheapening of the cost of transportation from the western end of Lake Superior to the eastern end of Lake Erie, it will be seen that there is probably very grave reason for the Minneapolis millers fearing a loss of the supremacy which they have so long enjoyed, and entertaining doubts even as to their ability to survive in existence with Eastern competition."

Western Fact and Fancy.

David W. Judd, of the American Agriculturist, who is now making a very extensive tour through the Far Western States and Territories, writes home as follows to his paper:

Going West.

The cheap lands are rapidly being taken. There will be none left at the end of five years' time, if they are absorbed as rapidly as they have been during the past five years. You must move quickly, if you secure any more farm lands on Government grants, or at three, four, and five dollars an acre from the railroads. First go out and explore the country before purchasing and taking your family with you. Explorers tickets are still furnished by most of the railroads, which have lands to sell. Take little baggage and few heirlooms with you. It costs money to transport them to the Far West. Be sure and locate in a healthful locality.

"Going East."

It was not so many years ago that people in proceeding from the New England States to Western New York, talk about going West to settle. While conversing with a herder not long ago, on a Kiowa ranche, a few miles this side of Denver, he casually remarked that he was going away after a while. I asked in what direction. "I thought I would go East, to Kansas, and spend the winter," was the response. In a few years more, people will be talking about coming East to Bismarck, Laramie, and Pueblo, for a visit, so rapidly does the tide of emigration move Westward.

A Hint to Land Buyers.

The farmers from beyond the sea, on coming West, as a rule, push out on to the prairie twelve or fourteen miles in preference to buying land near to the villages. They probably do this under the impression that land further away is worth more than land at the same price over which they directly passed. Thus it very often happens that you can purchase very good farming lands adjacent to the villages for just as much money as you would have to pay for lands many miles away. The foreigners will not stop to look at these because they think may be they are the "leavings."

Glanders in Horses.

Every horse-owner is more or less acquainted with that loathsome disease, the glanders, and every one should be aware that it is both contagious and fatal, not only to horses, but also to mankind. The fact that the disease has to this day baffled all treatment, is sufficient reason why the detection of glanders in a stable is always looked upon as serious. If the disease always assumed the same character, if every glandered horse presented the three special symptoms essentially belonging to it, namely, the greenish, sticky, and at times bloody discharge at the nose, the hard, painless, and adherent swollen glands at the jaws, and above all, the peculiar and characteristic ulcerations of the mucous membrane upon the cartilage of the cavities of the nose, there would be no difficulty in recognizing the disease, and condemning the animal thus afflicted as most dangerous. But this is not always the case. This disease assumes many forms. Sometimes only a slight glandular enlargement, again discharges from the nostrils, while in a third animal neither of these will exist, and only small ulcers will be detected in the upper angle of the nostrils. Still the animal is just as dangerous as if it showed all the symptoms fully developed; in fact, even more dangerous, for, while in this condition, it may apparently be in perfect health, its skin presenting nothing unusual to the ordinary observer. The horse may remain in good condition, feel as well as ever, be able to do its work, and remain thus for months, and communicate the glanders to many animals who may come in contact with it. It is necessary to detect the disease at the start, and for this no one should be better qualified than the regular Veterinarian; he who has by his studies become familiar with the different aspects of the disease. If once detected, there must be no hesitation; certainty of the existence of the disease should mean death to the animal affected. Unless it is killed, most serious, even fatal consequences, may follow.

The duty of the owner of an animal in a suspicious condition is, to have it examined at once. If there is no doubt about the disease, the horse must be at once destroyed. If there is doubt, it should be isolated and rather than wait for the development of all the symptoms, which may take a long time, inoculation of the matter from the discharge can be made on an old horse, a dog, or a rabbit, but still better on an old mule or a donkey. This inoculation will produce glanders, no matter how small the quantity of the virus if taken from a glandered horse.—President Llautard, in the American Agriculturist for October.

"It was pitched without," said a clergyman, having Noah's ark for his theme, and an old base ball player who had been calmly slumbering awoke with a start and yelled "foul." The first bass from the choir came down and put him out.

Out west the cellar is the place to go to in time of a cyclone, and when a man has a barrel of cider in the cellar, it's surprising how many times a day he thinks there is a cyclone coming.

"Rosbeeflambmuttonandam," said the girl who waits on the table at the Beach. "Well," said the old gentleman, "I've never tasted it, but you may bring me some and I'll see what it's like.

Barnes County Banner: Good credit is the next thing to cash. Farmers should remember this and not forget to square their store bill, pay their notes, and lift their chattel mortgages, so as to start fresh in the spring. A man has better courage in asking credit this year, and a greater prospect of getting it, if his last year's debts have been wiped out. The wheat crop is abundant, oats and barley have rarely yielded better, the cattle are fat, the horses bright in the eye, and unless a farmer has been unfortunate there is little excuse for the accumulation of debts this fall. Some of our phenomenal farmers, are doing business on a new plan, and measure the amount of their business by the number of chattel mortgages against them and the number of notes they have signed. So partial are they to a good showing in the chattel book, that they rarely take the trouble to have a mortgage released when it is paid. They have all kinds of machinery, from a fine tooth comb to the steam thresher, which are left to stand in the snow-drift when the fall work is done. If a merchant gives them credit this year, they leave their account with him unpaid, and next season they pay what cash they have to the man across the way. The result is these men will come to grief. If you can't pay up, renew or secure. Do something to show your good intentions.

The Pacific Slope.

Grand Forks Hearld:—Capt. Robt. Barton returned yesterday from a prospecting tour to Washington Territory. The captain visited all the principal points of interest situated west of the Cascade range of mountains. The captain informed a Herald representative last evening that Washington Territory is a better place for a capitalist or a working man than for people of small means who wish to engage in business. A good wood-chopper in the lumber woods commands $100 and board and an ox teamster from $125 to 150 per month. In reply to the inquiry as to the way the Chinese affected unskilled labor the captain said that the only branches monopolized by Chinamen were washing, cooking and menial employments which few Americans cared to follow. The timber lands adjacent Puget Sound and on all streams leading thereto have been taken up, and if a person preempts timber lands he is compelled to go so far back that the cost of transportation of logs and lumber would be in excess of its value. The crops in Washington territory, owing to the drouth will average about two-thirds. An enormous emigration of people are pouring in and every branch of busines is overdone. A. L. Teele, formerly of Grand Forks, has left Whatcom and is now located in Port Townsend, engaged in the practice of law. From the captain's observations, people who are comfortably situation in Dakota, cannot better themselves by going to Washington territory.

A Good Farmer.

According to a writer in London Farm and Home, a good farmer must combine the judgment of many different vocations; he must be a good financier—on a small scale, to be sure, but still a good one; also a good manager of labor; must combine the judgment of the grazier; the butcher; the gardener, and the merchant; he must also have that judgment about the conditions of the land and crops for which there is no written rule, and which careful observation only gives; and in addition to all this he must have that quality for which there is no name, but which generally adapts means to ends, and accomplishes things—which knows when to finish one thing at a time (which is generally best), and when to leave that thing and do something which needs doing more—the faculty which keeps his whole business together. This judgment is the farmer's first and greatest need; it is the high court which must pass upon all that is brought before it. The only man whose success is hopeless, and who will never acquire it, is he who thinks he knows it all in the beginning.

Advance in Agriculture.

But few readers of farmers are aware of the advance in agriculture in the past fifty years, or within the recollection of many of the older citizens. Fifty years ago the only means of cutting the grain harvest was the hand sickle, and of cutting hay the hand scythe. The grain was threshed with a flail, and the hay raked with a hand rake. Grain was cleaned by letting it fall and the wind blowing out the chaff, or by making wind with a sheet,—those who lived in those days recollect it without explanation. Plows were mostly wood, the coulter, shire and bar only being iron. The mouldboard was wood exclusively. At that day farming was conducted by muscular power. There were no agricultural newspapers to stir up the mind to advance and improve.

Nor was the absence of improved agricultural implements the only hindrance to prosperous husbandry. There was virtually no more attention paid to the improvement of stock. The cattle, horses, hogs or sheep were a mixture brought together from different counties. There was no more attention paid to better stock than there is now in the improvement of the human race. Nor was there any particular age at which steers or hogs could be prepared for market. They grew slowly and fattened indifferently, and had to be kept and fed until they could be sold. They were small and commanded a less price.

Fruits of all kinds were far inferior to the present. Nearly all of the orchards of apple, pear or peach were of the natural fruit. If grafting was known it was practiced by but few. The varieties of grafted fruit even in the best orchards or nurseries were but few. In the smaller fruits the same was the case. None but the wild strawberry were cultivated. If however, they did not have such large ones as the present, they were rich, luscious and highly flavored, or our appetite was better than now. There were no improved raspberries or strawberries.

Nor has the advance been solely in stock and fruits, but in vegetables there has been a wonderful change for the better. Potatoes, squashes, tomatoes, beans, peas, melons, and all other classes of garden vegetables have been so improved that if the kind which were raised fifty years ago were offered in the market now they could not be sold at any price. It seems almost incredible that the world in all past ages previous to fifty years ago made so little effort at improving anything intended for human food, or the implements for producing them.

When the writer first performed labor on the farm, there was a continual strain on the physical powers of the farmer. And in the house, whether on the farm or in town, the females of the family (and mainly the wife) had to card, spin, weave and make the clothing with which to keep the whole family warm or respectable.

And there are needed improvements yet to be made, and great inventions to be accomplished. There are laurels to be won, and riches to be accumulated in the future, by those who will, by mental and moral energy solve the great problems of the world's further advancement.—[Des Moines Register.

A humane person wrote to a New York paper a communication which he evidently intended to bear the caption line, "A Plea for Homeless Dogs." The truthful compositor, who could not tell a lie, spelled the word "plea" with a capital F. He was right. Most homeless dogs have 'em.

D 1882, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of Register of Deeds of the County of Polk, in the State of Minnesota, on the seventeenth day of May A. D. 1882, at eleven o'clock a. m. in book "H" of mortgages, on page 44. Said mortgage conveyed the hereinafter described real estate, to secure the payment of three hundred dollars due in one year with interest at ten per cent. per annum payable annually, and default having been made in the payment of said sum with interest, and no action at law or otherwise to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in the said mortgage and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: The north half of the northeast quarter of section numbered eight (8,) in township numbered one hundred and forty-seven (147,) range forty-four (44,) in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota with the hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging; which sale will be made at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in said County and State, on the twenty-seventh day of October A. D. 1883, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon of that day by the sheriff of said Polk County, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt, and interest, and the taxes if any on said premises and an attorneys fee of twenty-five dollars as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

Dated September 9th, 1883.

LOCAL NEWS.

The Tennesseeans to-night.

Ole Bang has just received 5,000 Acorn cigars. Sample 'em.

Carpenters to build a depot, roundhouse and water tank were sent to St. Hilaire on Saturday last.

Ole Bang has bought the stock of liquors of B. Alexander who will retire from the whole-sale trade.

Max Ericsson has his tables newly cushioned and covered and has added a number of chairs. He is nicely fixed up.

Mr. Geo. Crocker was in the city on Tuesday looking for a house to rent. He intends to come to Crookston to spend the winter.

Messrs. Lee & Herrick have just received their new rollers from Milwaukee, fourteen in number. They expect soon to commence grinding flour.

We have not seen Fred Fox but we are told that his wheat pans out 20 bushels strong and tests 62½ lbs. It will over run machine measure.

Bro. Mitchel, of the St. Vincent Herald, was in the city on Tuesday night. That can't have anything to do with Bierman's recent visit, can it?

J. E. Nordby, of Lake Park, Becker Co., was in the city on Tuesday. He has taken a fine claim in the thirteen townships and is now looking for a house to rent in this city for the winter.

Wilson & Thompson are daily expecting their bar furniture. They have their room fixed up in a neat and attractive style and will doubtless do their share of the business. They intend to put in pool and billiards.

Hon. H. Steenerson and county treasurer Lucken went down to Steenerson's farm on the Red River last week for a hunt. They do not report having bagged any bears but they report a good time and a fine lot of chickens.

Wm. Stuart has sold his interest in the Crookston Brewery to Messrs. Burkhardt & Walters for the nice little sum of $13,000 cash. Mr. Stuart intends to spend the winter visiting his friends in the east and take a little needed rest before going into business again.

W. E. McKinzie, of the St. Hilaire Spectator, is running the Chronicle during Dunn's absence. Meanwhile Steenerson, of the St. Hilaire Times, breathes freer, with nobody to molest or make him afraid. "How beautiful the sight of brethren who agree, etc., etc."

Mr. W. L. Wyand, traveling passenger agent for the Michigan Central Railroad, dropped off on Tuesday for a short visit with his brothers, John and Harry who have large farms just outside of the city. Mr. W. is one of those pleasant gentlemen with whom it is a pleasure to meet.

Mr. David W. Judd, President of the American Agriculturist Publishing Co. is traveling in the Northwest and writing up this country for the benefit of Agriculturist readers, many of whom are seeking for information concerning us with a view to becoming citizens of the New Northwest. The October number of the Agriculturist contains the first of the series of letters. Mr. Judd will make his work thorough and exhaustive.

Mr. G. M. Farnham, traveling passenger agent for the Buffalo, New York and Erie, Railroad, was in the city on Tuesday in the interests of his road. Together with Mr. Wyand he left on Wednesday for the Devil's Lake country. Those eastern railroads seem to be waking up to the importance of the trade of tihs New Northwest and are reaching out after a share of it.

J. C. Slotten, one of our old-time Becker County friends, came in on Monday to visit his brother, the Receiver in the Land Office. Jake has now a fine farm in the town of Fossum, in Norman Co., and is jubilant over a yield of at least 20 bushels No. 1 Hard per acre. He says the land in Twin Valley knocks the hind-sights clean off 'en the ould sod of Becker Co.

The JOURNAL acknowledges with pleasure, the receipt of a newsy letter from "BETH," at Beltrami. "BETH" seems impelled to this step from a sense of public duty rendered apparent through the masterly inactivity of "JIMMY" and "TELEPHONE," who have recently allowed the pen to become somewhat rusty. We gladly welcome "BETH" to a seat at our table and we trust that this chatty, newsy letter will not be the first and last effort.

Dan Albaugh, the genial advance agent of Phosa McAllister, greeted his friends at the depot on Monday en route to Winnipeg with his company. Dan authorizes us to say that Miss McAllister, with her excellent company will favor our citizens with an exhibition in Ericsson's Hall, on Wednesday evening, Oct. 3d. All who have seen Miss McAllister will be glad of this opportunity to see her again and all who have not will miss it if they do not see her.

Fred Moeckel has gone to Fargo to learn the jeweler's trade.

There will be trotting on the fair grounds race course on Tuesday and Wednesday next.

Mr. Robert Houston went out on the warpath last week and took the conceit out of several geese.

John Steenerson talks some of raising clams on his Hill River farm having found a pearl in a clam shell up there.

While away in eastern cities Mr. L. Fontaine bought large quantities of goods for that firm that are daily arriving.

The New York store, on Broadway has been closed for two days owing to the death of one of the partners, Mr. A. Fixen, of Racine, Wis.

Mr. W. H. McCulough has sold ten lots in Carman to Mr. T. B. Walker, and is making arrangments to go to Seattle, Washington, Ter., to spend the coming winter.

Messrs. Wilson & Thompson opened out in good shape on Saturday evening last. They occupy the building formerly occupied by Brower & McLean on Broadway.

Mr. John Hack Sr., of Red Wing is in the city for a two weeks stay. We are told that Hack & Gallasch have bought the building and lot where they are doing business.

Dr. Thoen, whose card appears in this issue has located in this city for the practice of his profession. The doctor comes well recommended and will doubtless do a good business.

Childs & Co., report 1754 bushels of wheat threshed in one day as their largest day's work, and 1063 as their largest half-day's work threshing. Can anybody get away with that record.

Mr. E. M. Walsh has sold his lot 100x140, on the corner of Broadway and Fletcher for $7,000 to M. Filiatrault, who intends to erect a brick block upon it. Property on Broadway is looking up it seems.

The Dickenson Brothers, on Saturday last, threshed with their Minnesota Chief Thresher, 8,400 bushels of oats, we are told. The machine is one of the ordinary size. This is one of the day's works what you read about.

K. D. Chase's water wheels have arrived and are being taken down to the race to be placed in position. A common wagon was found to be too light to handle them so Tom Harris' trucks were called into the service. They will be on deck in a short time.

Five or six wagon loads of people and plunder, en-route from Dakota to the thirteen towns, stopped in the city Monday night, leaving for their destination early on Tuesday morning. They take along their cattle, pigs, cows and all domestic animals, prepared to stay.

Articles of incorporation have been filed with the Secretary of State by the Crookston Boom and Water power Company, business to commence Oct. 1st 1883. T. B. Walker, president, and W. D. Hurlbut Secretary. This is another long stride taken in the city's march of improvement, a step that cannot help being of immense value to our city and county.

Mr. L. Fontaine has returned from his eastern trip and reports having had a good time. While gone he visited portions of Massachusetts and Connecticut and he says that times in those States are wonderfully and fearfully dull owing to drouth and lack of work in the big mills. He says this country knows nothing about hard times when compared to those eastern States. He saw thousands who would be glad to come here if they only had the means.

The first issue of the Red Lake Falls Gazette lies on our table. Our readers must not too liberally construe that word "lies" otherwise they may get the idea that we accuse the Gazette of being untruthful in its first issue. We don't. We simply wish to say that we have received the first number and that it is very creditable to Mr. Holmes, the publisher. While the Messenger has fully occupied the newspaper field in Red Lake Falls and been a credit to the place, still there may be a niche for another paper to fill and if there is O. M. can fill it as well as anybody.

The Grand Forks News has ceased to exist, and its subscription list, good will etc. etc., goes to the Herald which is just as it should be. The Herald, in announcing the demise of the News says that it was not obliged to die, could have lived just as well as not but simply died just for the fun of it or words to that effect. We had an idea that one of them had simply existed just for the fun of it for we never could see any legitimate business for three dailies in Grand Forks. We are glad that it is not the Herald or Plaindealer that has turned up its toes to the daisies for we believe in the principle of the survival of the fittest.

The Lady Washington Tea Party, held last Thursday evening was a grand success, considering the rain storm. Col. Gorgas, as the "Father of his Country" was immense while Mrs. Box did "Lady Washington" to perfection. If we should go through the list of characters it would take columns to do the subject justice. J. W. Lilly did ample justice to Powhatton while Miss Alice Box made the prettiest little squaw we ever saw. Josiah Allen's wife was there as natural as life—if any thing more so, while all of ye ancient ladies and gents sustained their parts well. The receipts we are told were about $50.

Pleasant weather again and the No. 1 Hard is pouring into the elevators by the wagon load.

It is said that the poem, "Lo the poor Indian" was what suggested Esq. Lilly for Powhatton.

Father Riviere is building a fine residence just north of the Catholic church building on Ash Street.

Mr. E. Perry has his fine new residence, on Ash Street, near Houston Avenue, nearly completed. It is a fine one.

Dr. Cable has bought a lot on Jerome's Addition and intends to build upon it and reside there this winter.

Wm. Ross, the genial cashier at the Merchants Bank, is building a residence on Jerome's Addition, at the corner of Bridge and State Street.

Henry Steege reports a yield of 20 bushels of No. 1 Hard wheat per acre on his new farm, the Theo. Greenhalgh place. He also raised 1078 bushels of oats.

Tom Bjoin has his new residence on Ash Street nearly completed, and will soon be ready to—but there, come to think of it we promised not to say anything more about it this week.

Service on the Crookston and Red Lake Falls Stage route has been increased from a tri-weekly to six times per week. Tom Bjoin will now have to send his stage out on every week day whereat he rejoices. Congressman Nelson is not forgetting this upper country it seems.

A sample keg of beer, with the compliments of the new brewery firm, found its way to our headquarters this morning. The boys pronounce it splendid and we have to take their word for it. The new firm are prepared to supply the needs of this New Northwest with the very best article of beer to be found anywhere. When you require anything in their line try 'em.

Notice the big ad of Sletten & Cromb in this issue and if you wish to purchase a residence lot convenient to the business portion of the city call on them. They have a number of choice lots left on their Addition which they offer at low figures. This Addition lies just across the river from Walker's new saw mill, has graded streets and side walks and is in every way desirable property.

Mr. Jacob Stambaugh, the bonanza farmer of the Sand Hill River country, was in the city on Wednesday. In conversation with him he said he had never seen such soil to stand a severe drouth. "Why," said he, "here in the Red River Valley we have had a three months drough and have got a grand crop of wheat, while in the east it only takes from three to four weeks of drough to ruin everything." Mr. S. will spend the winter in Ohio, (trying to make converts to the New Northwest, we trust.)

A Frightful Accident.

On Friday last, at about 4:15 a young Swede named Johan Peterson Johnson, was struck by a box car on a flying switch, knocked down and mangled fearfully. He was taken into the freight house, doctors summoned, and everything done that could be to aid him but his body was so mangled and crushed that he died in about two hours. Deceased was getting ready to leave on the Friday afternoon train for his old home at Trade Lake, Wisconsin. He had been at work on the section up till noon; at which time he received a letter from home desiring him to come he had quit work and been up the track where his comrades were at work to bid them good bye and was returning to his boarding house for his valise when the sad accident occurred. He had $702.80 in his pocket-book which he had earned by hard labor on the O. P. R. R., with which he was intending to get a home for his aged parents. The friends were notified of the sad event and the body taken charge of by undertakers Lambert & Mathews, who prepared it for burial. No news having been received from the parents, the body was interred on Sunday afternoon.

The committee on the McDonald plat reported favorably and report adopted. Bill for freight on hose cart, of $25.50 allowed as also for men on streets of $81.25.

Adjourned until Monday evening October 1st 1883.

The Coming Event.

Next Wednesday evening Oct. 3d Phosa McAllister, will appear at Ericsson's Opera House in the popular Irish drama "Arrah Na Pogue." Miss McAllister is one of the best if not the very best actress that ever appeared in Crookston. Her popularity throughout the United States and Canada is sufficient to crowd the largest Opera houses wherever she appears. She has called around her this season the best company that money could procure and we are pleased to learn that she is meeting with success wherever she goes. The Denver Republican of a recent date thus speaks of the lady and the company supporting her: "Last night, at the Tabor Grand Opera House, was witnessed the closing performance of that brilliant and accomplished actress, Miss Phosa McAllister, supported by one of the best dramatic companies that ever made a bow to a Denver audience. In making this assertion some may charge us with being altogether too flattering of her, but we can say in all sincerity that The Republican is not alone in this opinion. It is the verdict of the people. Miss McAllister is an actress of great merit, and from her first appearance, in "School for Scandal," she has steadily made a better impression, and won hosts of admiring friends, who will gladly welcome her in a very substantial manner on her return next season. As Rosalind, Miss McAllister stands without doubt at the head of the profession, her acting, voice and expression being all that could be desired, which of course means perfect."

Notice.

I desire to inform the public that although the late firm of Haseltine Bros., has been dissolved, yet I still continue the nursery business on the old nursery grounds at Crookston, Minn.

I introduced the nursery business at Crookston in the spring of 1879, on land I individually leased in my own name from Mrs. E. C. Davis, and which lease will not expire until October, 1884. In the autumn of 1881 I individually purchased, and now own, forty acres of land within the limits of the city of Crookston, which is well adapted for nursery purposes, and on which nursery stock is now growing and doing well. I have had nearly ten years experience in the nursery business in Wisconsin and Minnesota, and claim that my experience in the Northwest has been such as to enable me to fully determine and advise what varieties of nursery stock is best adapted to this Northwestern climate. In connection with the foregoing I desire to inform the public that E. W. Haseltine has no distinct nursery at Crookston. That when the late firm of Haseltine Bros. was dissolved in June, 1883, the stock of the old firm was divided and, by agreement then entered into, I stipulated to allow the said E. W. Haseltine to leave his share of the stock on my above mentioned lands, and leased lands, and the said E. W. Haseltine has agreed to remove from my said nursery grounds all his share of the stock so divided, on or before the first of June, 1884, and, in the meantime, to pay me rent for the use of a portion of said mentioned lands occupied by a portion of his share of the old firm stock. Hence I am the proprietor of the old Crookston nursery.

Thanking the public for its former patronage, I shall continue to fill all orders addressed to me, trusting that by fair dealing and promptness I shall continue to have the confidence and patronage of the public.

Prop. of the Crookston Nursery.

FARM AND HOUSE.

The New York World is authority for the statement that plaintain, if not permitted to go tossed for two years, will die out. Mow previous to seed time two years in succession.

To make cheap pork you must feed early. It will as a rule take double the food to make a pound in December that it will in September.

Veterinary practice was recommended to young men at a recent meeting of the Kentucky Medical society. The horses of the country being valued at $800,00,000, it is estimated that the annual loss from want of sound advice and treatment amount to $15,000,000.

The assessor's returns show the decrease in the number of swine in Iowa, this year from last, to be 180,000, increase of horses 29,000, increase of cattle 50,000.

Dogs have done more injury to sheep husbandry than all other causes combined, and, considering the importance of the evil, it does not receive that notice at the hands of the agricultural press that it rightly deserves. As a rule the larger number of dogs that devastate the flocks are worthless and valueless, and should not be tolerated in any community, but that they do exist is demonstrated by the complaints that come from all quarters regarding their ravages.—Field, Farm and Fireside.

Thomas Jefferson was the first to clearly state that the plow must consist of two wedges, one to act vertically and the other laterally and in curves so that the furrow may rise and turn over continuously and smoothly. In a paper to the French institute he attempted by mathematics to solve the problem of the true surface of the mold board.

The American Dairyman says: It is mooted in some quarters whether or not heifers can be made to yield a larger flow of milk by means of manipulating the udder with the hand before she has her first calf. We have often seen elongated teats caused by young calves sucking the heifer before parturition, and this was certainly a good point gained; but even a large udder does not always make a large milker, and we are of the opinion that the secretion of milk has nothing to do with the size of the udder. Large udders are the cause and not the effect, of large milk yields.

On suitable land with a climate favorable, it is best to raise mixed crops. Although the rule is a safe one. Still if a farm will not raise corn, but is suitable for fruit or grazing, then by all means follow that industry for which the soil is best adopted, for there are exceptions to all rules.

Mr. V. Griffin says that it would be well for those whom we send to make our laws to have the following sentences written upon the tablets of their memory: "The money made by farming is the cleanest, best money in the world. It fills the pockets of the farmer at the expense of no other man. His gain is no man's loss, but the more he makes the better for the world at large. Whatever benefits our agriculture benefits the commonwealth."

The object of ploughing is not merely to invert the soil but to pulverize it. Old ground is like mortar when plowed wet, and will not break up and become mellow; hence it might as well be planted without plowing at all. Sward ground will be partially pulverized by the elements envolved by the decomposition of the grass roots in the soil.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean claims that hay can be shipped profitably from the west because the improved method in bailing overcomes the disatvantages of being far from market. In the west improved presses and wire are used in baling hay, and a third more weight is put into the same space than in the Eastern states, where old fashioned presses and wooden hoops are used.

A western swine-breeder crossed a red male pig upon mixed Berkshire and Essex hogs, and from the result decided to continue the practice. The red hog has an exceptionally strong constitution, and would doubtless greatly improve upon most other breeds in the cross. Aside from this, the breeder says that the meat was better than any other he had ever eaten, and the hogs grew and fattened as well as the average of the improved kinds.

Housewive's Receipts.

It is said that an infusion of hay will preserve the colors of buff linens; an infusion of bran will do the same for brown linens and prints.

Excellent Cough Syrup Receipt.—One half pint whisky, one-half pint Orleans molasses, two tablespoons glycerine and one tablespoon laudanum.

Citron Preserves.—After preparing rinds soak in salt water twelve hours, fresh water twelve hours, alum water six hours, (a piece as large as a small egg to four gallons of water,) then boil in clear water until it can be pierced with a straw. Put them in a very thick syrup of one pound crushed sugar to one pound of rinds and boil until the preserves are clear.

A perfectly lovely foot cushion for the parlor may be made by embroidering a a bunch of dog-roses on a pale blue satin ground, which will form the center of the cushion, and finish it with a puff of pale pink satin, headed with a thick cord of blue.

Seed Buns.—Two pounds of flour, eight ounces of dripping, six ounces of sugar, one ounce of caraway seeds, a teaspoonful and a half of yeast. As these should rise quickly, mix as for other yeast cakes. When risen, roll out very lightly on a well floured board, cut with a tumbler, and bake in a quick oven. When rather stale, these buns are nice split in half, toasted and buttered, children being especially fond of them.

A nourishing drink for an invalid is made by toasting slices of bread which is made of rye flour and Indian meal; the slices should be cut thin, and should be thoroughly dried in the toasting process; put them in a pitcher, or in a bright tin pail; pour boiling water over them, and let this stand for half an hour. This may be iced, or may be drank while warm, and it will satisfy thirst, and give nourishment at the same time.

Oxtail Soup.—Cut the oxtails in joints and put them over the fire in three quarts of cold water to blanch, i. e. come to a boil. Make a bouquet of one sprig each of parsley, thyme, marjoram, and two bay leaves tied up compactly. Peel the onion and stick six whole cloves in it. Peel the carrot and turnip and cut them into half-inch dice. When the oxtails have come to a boil drain them, rinse them by rubbing cold water over them, dry them in a clean towel; put them again into the saucepan, with one ounce of butter, and fry brown. Pour over them three quarts of cold water, put in the carrot, turnip, onion and bouquet; season the soup with a level spoonful of salt and half a spoonful of pepper, cover the saucepan and let the soup simmer gently for two hours. Then take out the onion and bouquet and serve the soup.

Rose Cake.—One-half cup of butter, one cup of sugar (beat to a cream), add two cups of flour, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, same of essence of lemon, and the whites of five eggs, stir all well together. Take analine, size of a pea, tie in a thin cloth and pour a teaspoonful of boiling water on it; take of cake half a teacup, pour the analine on until you have a pretty rose color, put in a layer of cake, drop in here and there of your rose as oddly as you can, then a layer of cake, and so on until all are used. Bake in a slow oven.

Lucia Pudding.—Take eight large potatoes boiled and mashed smooth, one large cocoanut grated and the milk, three pints of milk, one nutmeg, one gill of rum or brandy, a piece of butter the size of an egg, one pound and a quarter of sugar and six eggs. Take the whites of the eggs and one half of the sugar, beating them well up and put on the top of the pudding after it is baked. Set in the oven to brown.

Ginger Cordial is made of four pounds of red or white currants, eight ounces of ginger root, two ounces of bitter almonds one-half ounce of sweet almonds, three lemons sliced, one gallon of whisky. Wash the currants, cut the ginger root in small pieces, crack and split the nuts, pour the whisky over these ingredients and let it stand ten days; then pour it off carefully, add four pounds of loaf sugar and bottle it.

A few drops of oil of lavender will save a library from mold. One drop will save a pint of ink.

Judging at Fairs.

The above is a timely topic and one in which most farmers are interested. It is certainly one unfortunate thing about the management of some fairs, that unfair awards are too frequently made, which gives rise to a feeling of dissatisfaction on the part of exhibitors. This is owing to one of two things, partiality or ignorance. Judges in some mysterious (?) way very often find out who are the owners of the exhibits which they are judging, and the credit or discredit for this may sometimes be given to the exhibitors themselves. For this reason they should never be allowed to consult the judges while at work. On the other hand judges should turn a deaf ear to any suggestions or bribes which may be offered. The other cause, ignorance, may also cause trouble sometimes. We have heard of judges of cattle (though of course not in New England), who actually did not know a Holstein from a Jersey. But it is sufficient to say that with many of the fine points of cattle, judges are often but little familiar. At our own county fair judges are hardly ever chosen before the day when their duties are to be performed and the consequence is, men who are not at all posted very often find their way upon the committee. We are much inclined to believe that the most desirable way is to have specialists pass upon the exhibits in every department, and thus do away with both these drawbacks to just judgment.

Protection of Growth of Forests.

The American association for the advancement of science, in its memorial to the several state governors on preserving and increasing our forestry supplies, makes, in substance, the following recommendations: 1. To protect by law trees planted along the highways, and to reduce taxes for encouraging such planting. 2. To exempt for a time from tax the increased value of land from planting trees in bare regions. 3. To appropriate money to existing societies to be applied as premiums for successful tree planting. 4. To offer prizes for the best reports and essays on practical forest raising, to be published and disseminated. 5. To encourage educational institutions in introducing a course of instruction on tree raising—such as by correctly labelled specimen plantations, and the distribution of seeds. 6. To impose penalties for careless or willful setting forest fires, the waste from which cause has in some years greatly exceeded the amount of timber used.

How to Grease a Wheel.

The Coachmaker's Magazine indorses the statement that few people are aware that they do wagons and carriages more injury by greasing too plentifully than in any other way. A well-made wheel will endure constant wear from ten to twenty-five years, if care is taken to use the right kind and proper amount of grease; but if this matter is not attended to, it will be used up in five or six years. Lard should never be used on a wagon, for it will penetrate the hub, and work its way out around the tenons of the spokes, thus spoiling the wheel. Tallow is the best lubricator for wooden axletrees, and castor oil for iron hubs, but many of the patent axle greases are also excellent, and have the merit of being cheaper and more convenient to handle. Just grease enough should be applied to the spindle of a wagon to give it a slight coating. This is better than more, for the surplus put on will work out at the ends, and be forced by the shoulder bands and nut-washer into the hub around the outside of the boxes. To oil an iron axletree, first wipe the spindle clean, wet with spirits of turpentine, and then apply a few drops of castor oil near the shoulder and end. One teaspoonful is sufficient for the whole.

How is it you can tell such whoppers?" asked a caller, addressing the editor of the fish-story department. "Well, you see," replied the editor, "Our wife's name is Anna." My Love He Went A-Sailing.

It was a lonely little house, and Aunt Prim lived in it—a lonely little house tucked under the pines, with its green-eyed palinus staring down the road, and its back yard jammed against the mountain.

Some women have a talent for growing old. Aunt Prim looked as if she had been born so—as if, some way, nature had varied her usual routine and quarried her out, or dug her up, or rained her down, or——

Long and narrow, like Barbara Allen's grave, was Aunt Prim, with frost-bitten hair and a face that looked like the brown, withered kernel of a nut. Her cheeks were ditched with wrinkles that crawled in and across each other like tangled threads, and there were lines about her mouth that Time could never have drawn thre without calling Trouble to its aid.

Trouble! If Miss Pamela Burton could have carried her woes to market and sold them her wealth could have rivalled that of the diamond-crested Princess of Bagdad, who ordered fried angels for tea! Jack alone, as a salable affliction, was worth its weight in nuggets. And as to Jack's dear friends!

Not that she would for one inhuman minute have dreamed of trading off her scapegrace, for all he came home regularly irregular with twists in his ankles and ungodly words that ought to have but did not, blister his tongue; for was he not the only son of that only sister under the gay weeds of a Kentucky churchyard, and did he not bear the name of that other Jack at the bottom of the everlasting seas?

There comes a Jack of some sort into most women's lives, and Aunt Prim had never forgotten the blue-flannel-clad lover who had gone down to the sea in a ship that in its turn had gone down under it in a storm. He was the one shining mark in her youth, and death had loved it. Poor Aunt Prim!

Then after many drab colored years, Jack had come into her life, a lad when he scamperd off to spade up a fortune in these Western hills, she found him a lad still, for all he towered above her like the pines and his hair was as gray as granite.

Found him half dead and wholly disgusted, with his fortune still under the ground and himself so very nearly so that being white and womanish with fever, he had clung to her like a child fears the dark; and she, having nothing better to do with her life, had carried him away from the little mob of a town huddled up on the hillside and took him home and adored him.

If in this progressive world there breathes a woman strong-minded enough to overcome her weakness for prodigals, Aunt Prim had yet to profit by her illustrious example—and a prodigal with a dimple in his chin!

"Aunt Prim," he said, one wintry night, as he watched her whisking about the fire with her steak and potatoes and tea—for Jack was always friendly with the teapot when he wasn't wild with whisky—"it must be no end of dreary here when I am on the tear; why don't you get married?"

The eyes that Miss Pamela Burton turned on her nephew looked like the taste of sassafras tea.

"If it wasn't for them gray hairs of your's I'd answer that question with my slipper—marry indeed! If it wasn't for the likes of you no——."

She had said something rash—she guessed it by the way the red came swimming up in her cheeks; she was sure of it by the suspicious conduct of that demoralizing dimple.

"Seems as if your mind was made up handy enough without my pitchforking the idea into your head. I don't say a nice girl wouldn't be a God's blessing to me—for it is dreary—but such trash as blows about Shantyville, miners' girls and dancing jacks and the like——"

"She isn't a miner's girl," persisted the prodigal, indignantly.

"Then she's a dancing jack, which is worse!"

"Draw it mild, old lady," he said, planting himself at the table and patronisingly patting her on the head, "you are sampling the best brand ever bottled—she does dance, that's a fact and sings like—well, I just wish you could hear sing!"

"Jack Burton!" exclaimed his ancient brown relative, in the most uncompromisingly virtuous tones, "when I broke up the old home in Kentucky and followed you here to—to—this, I allowed to suffer and maybe to die with a redskin's hatchet in my brain, but I did not calculate to disgrace my old age kicking up shines in a dance house!"

As if he had even hinted at such a thing! But that was just like Aunt Prim and Aunt Prim was just like every other woman in the world!

"So you won't call on Polly?" demanded the prodigal, anxiously.

"No, I won't call on Polly, and if she dares to call on me just let her—that's all!"

Lonely! There was the black world all around her, and the big, solemn mountain, with its hushed cries and echoes of the night. There were the dismal pines shooting up towards the starless sky, and there was Jack—at least that was where Jack ought to have been—but Aunt Prim, being resigned to these nightly excursions to the giddy metropolis of Shantyville, was just setting herself to dream comfortably of wildcats and Indians, when there came a sudden and terrible knocking at the lonely little door.

But there it was, and there it kept up until, white and quivering, she crept to the key-hole and called in the faintest of voices, "Whose there?"

"A woman."

A woman? Aunt Prim was a match for a woman any day; but this was night—a dark night on a desolate road—and, as discretion is really better than valor taken all around, Miss Burton resorted to the key-hole and cried out in a trifle more valorous tone:

"Go away—didn't I see your coat tails through a chink in the door——?"

And then something fell outside, and a low moan crept into Aunt Prim's ear with such pitiful distinctness that she unbarred her fortress and found her lying there—a woman, indeed, with sealed eyes and streaming hair, all in a heap on the step. To drag her in and rebolt the door was child's play to an energetic savior like Aunt Prim, and for the surprising circumstances that had upset [illegible] There was a school waiting somewhere in the hills for its teacher, and Miss Burton made up her mind it should wait!

It had been a dismal day, and nature, after crying her eye out, was sobbing herself to sleep at last in the drizzling twilight, as Aunt Prim and her visitor sat in the firelight waiting the prodigal's return.

Two months! It might have been two years since that lucky night! Miss Burton, watching the girl as she sat at the window with her eyes on the darkening road, wondered now she would ever manage without her—how Jack would ever manage without her, should she take a notion to grow restless and hail another stage coach for that school among the hills.

Aunt Prim need not have bothered, for the girl was a gay, self-satisfied little creature, liked things that came in her way, and among them Jack and his dimple. As to Aunt Prim—she simply adored Aunt Prim.

Young and pink and velvetry—that was Miss Paulina Davis—with braids and braids of copper-gilt hair, and a fresh, fearless voice that loved to hear itself sing. She was singing as she sat there in the twilight singing in a low, confidential fashion that ought to have put Aunt Prim to sleep as usual, except for—what was it that shocked her into consciousness again?

"A-sailing, a-sailing, my love has gone a——"

"Don't, my dear," cried Aunt Prim, wistfully. "It sounds pretty, but they never do come back, and it seems so useless to expect them."

"Meaning ships?" interrogated Miss Davis, vaguely.

"Ships—and sailors," answered Aunt Prim with the mournful experience of one who knows.

"Bless you, Miss Prim!" she laughed out with sudden interest. You mountain folks here get your horrors from the papers. You just ought to go down to the coast and see them swarming there as plentiful as shrimps! You see, I can't help knowing all about it, because my father was a sailor once, and many's the time we used to stroll down the sands with the waves booming in and all the world smelling of salt and seaweed, and I would sing and he would reel off his yarns, as happy as a pirate—poor dear pa! We had our squall sometimes," she went on, with a regretful sigh, "and down to the very last I never would give in to pa about——. Of course, I didn't blame him for marrying my mother in a spurt of a hurry like he did, because his luck was blowing dead against him; but to send word home that he was drowned, just to get rid of the girl he was engaged to—now you know that wasn't right, and I up and told pa so over and over again."

Aunt Prim, remembered the hero who would not have acted so for kingdoms, shook her head and softly sighed in repose.

"Once pa told me to consider the circumstances and look at ma, and I did consider; and the more I blamed him for allowing her to wait and hope and mourn at last for the lover who had gone down honored to the grave. That's what I told pa, and at last—to show you how it was only pa's thoughtfulness, after all—he said to me one night, 'Parmelie, my dear——'"

"Par what?" gasped Aunt Prim, as she turned around blankly on Miss Davis. "I thought your name was——"

"So it is," she answered, laughingly. "That was just a notion of pa's, poor dear! and so when I went to his bedside he never got up out of it, poor love—he said, 'Parmelie, my dear, you were right, and here's your father at death's door, wishing to God he had gone down honest and true on the Sea Shell—ma'am?"

But Aunt Prim had not spoken a single word. She had moved her chair a bit, that was all; and Jack's trampings up the path just then sent Miss Davis to the door with such glad, careless haste that she quite forgot to finish the rest of her story.

When at last they entered the room together they found Aunt Prim waiting for them, and this is what she said—said it with such a broken up, old womanish quaver in her voice that it went to Jack's heart like a chill.

"Because I can't help loving you," she said, putting her hand on his shoulder, "and because you were sorry for the girl who waited and hoped and mourned her lover in his honest grave, I forgive you both. I—I—am going to bed now; good night, John! Good night, Polly!"

And to save their lives they never could guess how Aunt Prim had found out about the dancing Jack from Shantyville, and of course she never told them

To Keep the Girls Warm.

The Providence Journal has looked into the statistics of the seal trade and presents the following interesting points relating to it: A seal skin sacque costs fifty per cent. more than it did five years ago. Seal skins have not been worn more than fifteen or eighteen years. Fashion and the discovery of new methods of preparing and dyeing, or first the latter and second the former, brought them into use. The seal fur, as seen here, is the inner coat. When on the back of the seal this fine fur is hid by coarse hairs, which are removed by a process of paring down the under side of the skin. The color of the fur as known to wearers is artificial. If the government had not taken measures to protect the seal new wearers of seal sacques would be few in a short time. The Shetland seals were once numerous, but have been exterminated. The Newfoundland seal is in the market, but is inferior to the seal of Alaska. The islands of the Behring Sea are the only ones in the world where seal catching has great commercial importance.

Laura's Little Mistake.

From the Terre Haute (Ind.) Express.

A very laughable occurrence was witnessed at the Union depot last night. When the train from the south stopped a lady alighted and seeing a gentleman standing by whom she supposed to be her husband she ran toward him and throwing her arms about his neck showered kisses upon him. The gentleman made no objection, but when she ceased her osculation a gentleman standing near by remarked: "Well, Laura, haven't you made a mistake?" Laura turned toward him in astonishment and flying into his arms [illegible] saying, "Lord bless me, Steve I thought it was you! why did you not speak?"

The Oldest.

New Haven Register.

The exigencies surrounding the care of succeeding brothers and sisters cause him to be sent adrift at an early age. At three years he is a boy, at 6 a nuisance, and at 10 is looked upon as one of charge d'affairs of the family. Is there an errand to run? he is trusty; are there chores to do about the house? he is strong; do the father and mother wish an evening out? he must keep his sleepy eyes open and care for the house, and see that the younger ones do not kick the bed blankets off and take cold; does he need an overcoat, suit of clothes or a new fur cap? the wants of his juniors are not half supplied, and, besides, he has old clothes not quite outgrown, as yet. In short, the oldest is "put upon" for the sake of the younger ones of the family, and his life is made one perpetual sacrifice for others. He growls about it sometimes, but after all he learns the lesson of good will and kindness so thoroughly that when he grows up it becomes second nature to him, and he begins active life with manhood firmly engrafted in him. The chances are that the oldest will make the best.

The Peculiar Old Mystery!

It was one of the peculiarities of the old-fashioned Doctors that they never would tell patients what they were prescribing for them. They said it would do the patients no good to know, and that it would only be gratifying a foolish curiosity. In order to keep patients from knowing, they would write the prescriptions in dog-Latin, so that most patients could not read them. All that sort of thing is now over. The patient wants to know what he takes. He is weak, and wants to be strong, or he is dyspeptic, and wants to digest well. Or he has a troublesome liver which he wants to put to rights. So he takes Brown's Iron Bitters about which there is no mystery at all. This is the best preparation of iron in the world, in combination with gentle yet efficient tonics. It gives strength. It builds up enfeebled systems. It enriches impoverished blood. It removes feminine weaknesses. It casts out debility. It is what you want, and your druggist has it.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

A SONNET FROM THE PORTUGUESE.

My own beloved, who hast lifted me
From this dear flat of earth where I was thrown,
And in betwixt the languid ringlets blown
A life-breath, till the forehead hopefully
Shines out again, as all the angels see,
Before thy saving kiss! My own, my own,
Who comest to me when the world was gone,
And I who only looked for God, found thee!
I find thee; I am safe, am strong, am glad.
As one who stands in dewless asphodel,
Looks backward on the tedious time he had
In the upper life—so I with bosom swell,
Make witness, here, between the good and bad,
That love, as strong as death, retrieves as well.

—Mrs. J. E Browning.

MICK TANDY'S REVENGE.

"And why's the r'ason ye'll not be my wife, Kathlie?"

"Only bekase I can't, Mick."

"Why?"

"Bekase."

"Niver?"

"No, Mick, never!"

There was silence for a moment in the lovely glen of Coloony where sweet Cathleen was gathering water weeds from the edge of a great mud puddle, for her green goslings at home.

The lover who had followed her thither was not in holiday attire. He wore a brown paper cap on his head, a leather apron about him, and corduroy breeches, gray stockings and hob-nailed shoes on his great legs and feet. Mick Tandy was a stalwart, handsome, energetic fellow, who could have gained the hand of any rustic beauty in his native country. And he knew it.

During the silence that followed these words, he was looking down tenderly on the young girl before him; but her gaze was fixed on a company of shearers who were relieving a pack of sheep of their wool, in the far-away stream, which ran, like a blue ribbon, through the green meadow.

"Give me yer r'asons for bein' such a fool, Kathlie," said the young blacksmith. "Bekase is no r'ason at all."

"Don't be botherin' me Mick," said Kathleen, in a pleading tone, with tears hanging on the long lashes that fringed her gray eyes.

"There's some other boy in my way!" he exclaimed almost fiercely.

Kathleen, turned her head slightly, and a little flush came in to her cheek.

"Is it not that same that ails ye?"

"And it is." said Kathleen, frankly.

"It's the Earl's waitin' man. A white faced fool that chooses rather to dance around anither fool, with a brush in his hand, than to do brave, hard work with the two stout fists God gave him!"

"It's never a bit him!"

"Is it the inn-kaper's son, who wears the rid diamin' pin and drinks half his father's whisky?"

"Never him!"

"It surely can never be Teddy Looney, that's contint to mind sheep and shear 'en? The little spaleen, with curls and pink cheeks like a girl, and a cough like a sick collie-dog?"

"It's just him, Mick!"

Mick threw back his head and laughed. But it was a bitter scornful laugh. "Look at thim two hands o' mine, as strong as iron and as black as coal; hands that had shod two hundred horses afore they was twenty-five years old! And my father with two-hunder and fifty pounds o' money in the bank for me! Look now at me with a hunder and saxty pounds of flesh on my bones, and two arms that can thrash any three lads in Coloony! Am I like him?"

"Yese not, indade!"

"Am I as poor as him whose father has bare enough laid by to bury his family?"

"Yese not."

"Thin will you marry me in place of him?"

"Niver!"

"And why niver?"

"Bekase I loves him and he's so pretty, Mick," said Kathlie, with amusing frankness, and blushing deeply.

"Thin I'll bate him till I put out the small bit o' beauty and the little life that's in him!" cried Mick, fiercely.

"Yese not mane enough to bate a lad less than yersel, Mick! Ye were niver a coward afore! Don't be one now! If ye want to fight sarch for one that's yer equal for size and beauty; small chance for findin' one!"

"I'l do that, my jewel!" cried Mick, greatly molified by this shrewd compliment. He drew a heavy sigh, and as he walked away he said, mournfully, "God bless ye, Kathlie, whatever happens to your poor, wake-chisted, low-voiced thing o' a lover. I see now it's the shearers ye are waitin' for rather than gatherin' water-wades for the goslin's."

Teddy and Kathleen had long had secret plans for emigrating to America—that terrestial heaven of the Irish. And now Kathleen, being seized with fear of the powerful young blacksmith, hastened the wedding and the departure. So quietly and quickly were their plans carried out, that they had set sail from Liverpool before their neighbors knew they were married.

Many are the gay dreams of wealth and pleasure that dance in the brains of young emigrants which are rudely broken or never fulfilled! Teddy and Kathleen were compartively rich, for they landed with good strong clothes and shoes, two blue wooden boxes and "twinty pounds o'money."

Perhaps this innocent boy expected to find applicants waiting to engage him to tend flocks and to shear them at Castle Garden! Perhaps Kathleen, in her ignorance, thought of stepping at once into a bright little home of her own with a looking-glass and a rocking-chair ready to reflect and to receive her! But there was no call for shepherds, and Teddy was not strong enough for rough work on a farm or, a railroad; nor yet for enduring the close air of a factory.

They tried first one place and then anther; one kind of work and then another! till their "fortune" of one hundred dollars was gone. Then they wrote home, under charge of secrecy; and a fond grandfather sent Kathlie ten pounds, with which they went west. Next, Teddy fell ill, and they wrote again, and the other grandfather sent a hoarded five pounds, and with that they came east again!

The years flew by, Teddy working when he was able, and Kathleen working able or not, to keep up a home for the two little ones who had come to share their misfortunes. All this time they had not crossed the path of any old friend who could write the truth about their condition to the neighbors at home; and the proud parents and grand-parents had allowed the impression to get abroad in Coloony that Teddy was in fine business and Kathleen a great lady in the city of Lowell, convanient to Boston."

It had been all that the angry young blacksmith could do to bear his disappointment and loss. It was a consolation to him, after they had sailed, to imagine the poor, frail Teddy rent with the agonies of sea-sickness; and we are sorry to say that more than once he said a prayer not written in the book—"that yon white-faced young baby of a man might be s'a-sick till he was turned wrong side out, and then cast into the s'a, dead intirly!"

Mick, not withstanding his fiery temper, was, after all, a generous fellow. I am sure that, could he have known what his old friends were passing through in a strange land, he would have sent them without revealing his agency in the matter, some of his hard-earned "pounds o' money." But he could not forgive their imaginary wealth and happiness.

He grew moody and gloomy, and his parents feared for his reason. They urged him to go to confession—a ceremony he had seldom gone through, as his sins never troubled him much. But he went to the priest to please his mother.

The well-meaning old father asked all sorts of questions to learn what the trouble was that was pressing on his heart.

"Have ye iver murdered anybody and hid him in the bog?" he asked.

"'Deed I haint, thin!" replied Mick.

"Have ye iver stole money, or its value?"

"'Deed, I haint done that, ather!"

"Have ye coveted your neighbors' goods?"

"'Deed, I've no nade o' doin' that, for I've got more mysilf nor most o' them has!"

"Have ye lied agin yer enemies!"

"'Deed, I haint! I've a better way o' settlin' them. I jist ups wid my right fist and knocks 'em down widout the trouble o' lyin' agin 'em!"

The priest rebuked this spirit, and asked if there was a grudge in his heart against any fellow-creature.

"Plinty o' 'em, yer riverence."

"Go this hour and ax their pardon," was the good advice of the old man.

"Faith, the one agin whom I am evilest is far away—beyont my power, yer riverence."

And as he said this, the thought darted into his mind that if he "could jist get over the sea and give Teddy a fine thrashin' he would feel better." "I'll take yer advice, hooly fayther, and hunt him on the other side o' the s'a."

And at once the gossip about Mick's low spirits was turned into a new channel. It was now said that he was conscience-struck about the curses he had prayed down on Teddy Looney, and was going to America to ask his pardon as a penance. When asked by an old friend if he had really forgiven Teddy, he replied,—

"Yes, have I, till I gets within arms reach o' him; and then he'll find out what Mick Tandy's revenge is—will he!"

So Mick left his forge, his anvil and his leather apron, and set sail, to the great grief of the many who had always found a friend in the hot-headed, warm-hearted fellow.

The street lights burned dimly in a dingy part of the city of Lowell, when a stalwart fellow, with a strong Irish brogue on his tongue, stepped into a grocery and asked "Would you be tellin' me, sir, where lives a rich gintleman in these parts by the name of Looney?"

"I do not know of any gentleman in the city of that name," was the reply.

"Did ye never hear the name in these parts?"

"No; except a family up Dash Lane, in one of the factory tenements."

Then Mick, thinking these poor people might direct him to their rich namesake, followed the grocer's direction, and soon found himself mounting a ricketty stairway, every board of which creaked beneath his ponderous tread.

He tapped at the door to which he had been directed, and in a moment it was opened and he saw dimly by the light of a poor lamp a woman with one child in her arms. Everything in the room was very poor but very clean.

"Is this Misthress Looney?" he asked.

"Yes, yer honor," replied the woman, softly.

"I'm new come from Coolony, Ireland, mistress, and am s'arching for old friends by your name. They're people in fine circumstances, and I thought ye might direct me to em."

The woman caught her breath, for the voice was familiar, and she rose up and laid her child down and stood at the door while her visitor stood in the dark entry.

"Och, dear Coloony!" she gasped. "I'm from that same myself; but I never heard of another one in this place blessed enough to be born there—dear, dear Coloony!"

"The wife's name, afore she married, was Kathleen Byrne, and she married a fable sort o' young man, and some say they got rich here. If I heerd right, he had a foctory o' his own in this place."

"What ails ye, poor sowl?" cried Mick, thrusting his hand into his pocket for his purse to relieve her suffering.

The light, which was behind the woman, had shone on Mick's face, and Kathleen knew him and thought he had come to persecute her in her distress.

"What ails ye, woman, that ye howl and wail this way?" he asked.

"Och, Mick, ye never knew this pale, overworked cr'atur for Kathleen!"

"Niver! What has befell ye?" he asked, stepping into the room and taking her two thin hands kindly in his own, and adding, "Where is Teddy?"

"He's in his grave this last six months, I thank ye," was the meek reply.

"And who sees after ye and the childer?" for he now saw another child asleep in the room.

"Not a one! I washes and scrubs—but O Mick, I'm that sick and heavy, I'd be glad to go back and lie down in the dear old churchyard at Coloony and rest!"

"There's rest this side o' the grave;" cried Mick. "Ye needn't go there for it, dear heart."

And Mick stooped down and took up a chubby, sleeping boy of four years, remarking, not very delicately, as he stroked back his golden curls, "There's no look of the fayther in him, thank heaven."

Kathleen was too much overwhelmed to notice this remark; and when she removed her apron from her eyes little Teddy was laughing and playing with the iron chain that guarded the blacksmith's silver watch.

In another hour the whole party, Kathleen carrying the younger boy and Mick leading small Teddy, were gazing into the store-windows, resplendent with gay colors and jets of gas. They were on a shopping excursion, and went home laden with groceries, dry-goods, and new shoes all round, besides oranges and candy.

Before Mick left his old friend he told her she should never want "while his two fists were spared him—if—if—she would only take him now in the end, and let him be a fayther to poor dear Ted's little boys."

"Shame on ye, Mick, to be sayin' the likes o' that, and Teedy only six months in his grave!" sobbed Kathleen.

"But ye'll not say 'niver,' as ye once said in the vale of Coloony?" asked Mick.

"No, Mick, I'll not say that, but I'll ask a respectable time to mourn in; and manetime I'll work hard to fade my darlin' boys!"

"If I can do twice the work o' any blacksmith in this country, ye nade not break yer heart o'er anybody's washtub!" and with lavish pride Mick threw a handful of gold coin at her feet.

"I wouldn't touch it," cried Kathleen, "while I can work. I took the shoes and eatables from sheer want!"

"Och, well, I'll sarch out yer priest and give it to him for ye! It'll be holy if it come through his hands," said Mick, smiling. "How long will it take ye to mourn it out, Kathlie?"

"Maybe a year, Mick," was the innocent reply.

"Couldn't ye get through sooner than that?"

"I'll try," replied the modest creature. "and see what his riverence says about it. But I'll only take ye on two conditions, Mick—that ye mend yer timper, and that ye put up a headstone to poor dear Teddy's grave!"

"I'll do that last—half-dozen of 'em if ye say so—and do it with a hearty good will. Och Kathlie, I've grown wonderful hooly since I've touched foot to American shores. I cam, here as fierce as a lion to be revenged on Ted, and here's me to-day, so hooly that I've forgiven him intirely, and am supportin' his family for him, and puttin' up a headstone to his grave!"

Mick found profitable work in another city, and Kathleen was well looked after by the priest, who had a little fund to draw on for her wants. When the "mournin'-year was out," Mick, who had conquered his spirit in a good degree, moved his family in a style that showed real prosperity, to his new home, and put on a "fufty-dollar headstone to Teddy's grave," on which was this inscription:

"SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF
EDWARD LOONEY, AGED 30 YEARS,
BORN
COLOONY IRELAND.
ERECTED BY HIS LOVING AND GRATEFUL FRIEND,
MICHAEL TANDY.

And thus ended Mick's revenge. Love for his old friend and her little ones had softened his heart towards the whole world.

Miscellaneous Paragraphs.

Maggie Ballentine, a sweet Virginia girl of seventeen years, was burned recently by her clothes taking fire from a match which she had just used in lighting a pipe she was smoking.

It is estimated that within the last three years over 180,000,000 cans of tomatoes have been consumed in this country. The statistics indicate the prosperity of canning factories and the growth in popularity of the once unfamiliar "love-apple."

At Mineral Park, Arizona, the coyotes are so tame that they come into town and play with the dogs.

Louisiana claims that during the past year great success has been achieved in restoring her levee system to a high state of efficiency. The embankments resisted the great flood of last year better than even the most sanguine could have expected.

There are said to be about 90,000 drummers in this country, including men who run around selling on commission. Some of them get $1,000 a year and expenses, quite a number from $3,000 to $5,000 a year; and the average salary is about $1,500 and expenses, which average $6 a day.

A dog of the shepherd breed, owned by Aaron Hutchinson, of Mansfield, Conn., not only possesses the usual accomplishments common to the educated canine, such as shaking hands, awaiting the signal three to snap the piece of bread, speaking, etc., but he also sings, "Sit up, hold up your paw and sing" says his mistress, and Pedro will pose in a most knowing attitude, and to a musical accompaniment will join his voice varying his song as the tune is high or low, fast or slow, and stop when the instrument ceases.

One of the prominent insurance companies of Hartford recently appointed a young man to a vacancy caused by a resignation of a woman stenographer. It is stated that this is in accordance with what is now the settled policy of the company, which has hitherto employed a number of females. Women do the work well for a time, but it is said to the general impression in insurance circles that they are deficient in "staying qualities."

Louisiana boys take young mocking birds just before they can fly and sell them to New Orleans Creoles for 10 or 15 cents a piece. The Creoles sell them to German or Italian retail dealers for 50 cents, and the dealers, mainly peddlers, receive $3 and $4 for them in the north. The peddlers say that rich people do not buy birds; they prefer dogs.

Florida lemons—A Jacksonville merchant has just shipped north 200 boxes of lemons grown in Florida. They are said to be as fine lemons as can be grown anywhere, their color being perfect, while they are finely flavored, and as juicy as the best Messinas. Mr. Bean, the shipper of the lot, says the fruit-growers throughout Florida are paying very much more attention to growing lemons since a successful experiment was made in curing them last season, and are setting out or budding a large number of trees.

According to recent reports, South Africa will soon be important for something besides diamonds and Zulu wars. Mr. David Jones, a mining engineer, has just sent to England a formal report, in which he states that there is good ground for believing that there are abundant coal mines in South Africa. The coal which has already been mined is rather poor in quality, but it is steadily becoming better. If the supply of coal should prove to be abundant and good, South Africa will present many attractions to the emigrant from Great Britain.

Boring for coal at Jacksonville, Ill., has been discontinued, after reaching a depth of 935 feet, leaving a balance of $400 against the enterprise in excess of the amount raised for the purpose. The last boring was in hard rock, and all hopes of reaching coal there seemed to have been abandoned. The result confirms the theories of the geoligists, and the enterprise will probably never be renewed in view of the failure of previous experiments.

Army officers are discussing a proposition to change the law regulating the pay of enlisted men so as to retain in the hands of the government half their wages, upon which interest will be allowed at the rate of four per cent. per annum. This will assure each private over $400 with which to start in the world when his first term of enlistment expires, besides teaching economy and a habit of laying up part of his earnings. On the other hand some argue that, though this may be an excellent plan for giving a young man a start in life, very few men with $400 in hand will re-enlist in the army; and to withold half the pay and allow privates only to receive $6,44 per month of their wages would go far toward entirely stopping the business of recruiting.

General Gleanings.

When Texas came into the Union it had 200,000,000 acres of land which it reserved to itself for future emigrants and for use in developing its resources. With the advent of railroads, however, grants were made lavishly, and now it is found that more land has been given away that existed. The books indicate that there are still 160,450 acres left, but, as no account was made of water courses and many errors have been made, there is in fact a deficiency of over 2,000,000 acres. The granting still goes on, however,

Speaking of the contrast between the trial of Mrs. Surratt and Guiteau, the Boston Advertiser remarks: It has been suggested, by way of contrast with the Guiteau trial, that "sixteen years ago a woman who was, at the worst, only a constructive partner in the assassination of a president, sat manacled hand and foot before the tribunal which was trying her." That was a military trial, conducted when the passions excited by the war were still hot, and the laws, long silent, had hardly begun to assert themselves. Long, long may it be before there will be occasion for another trial like that.

It is said that every lake in Southern Florida that is large enough has its family of alligators. They visit each other from lake to lake. When a person encounters one in the woods the beast runs to the nearest water. If hemmed he stops, swells and blows like a mad bull. They handle their tails briskly in resisting an enemy or flipping a hog or dog into their great mouths. They are omnious eaters, and devour almost everything. When their stomachs are opened they are found to contain pine knots and black mud. They eat many of the best fish and largest turtles of the lakes.

"You said you were going to vote for me," indignantly exclaimed a defeated candidate, addressing Mike, the well-known Irishman. "An' didn't I vote fur ye? "Naw you didn't." "Well, sor, in that evint, there's only one conclusion that I kin arrive at." "And what is that?" "That I towld ye a lie, sor."

A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

"Such a wedding! No bridesmaids, no music, no breakfast or reception! I declare I should not feel as if I had been married!" exclaimed Marion Willoughby, throwing herself down upon a low fauteuil in her own elegantly-appointed drawing-room, and drawing off the delicately-tinted gloves which served as a finish to the exquisite Parisian toilet.

There was only one other occupant of the room, a man, tall and handsome, standing with one hand resting lightly on the back of her chair. She did not glance up as she spoke, or note that Chester Thorley's face had lost its color.

"You are speaking of Miss Marvine's wedding?" he said. "There is one essential to most marriages you have not enumerated in your list of things lacking. Was love wanting, too?"

"Oh, no! I believe she loves him. She certainly must do so to an almost absurd extent. They are to go to housekeeping in a small flat in an unfashionable locality up town, where he must be away from early morning until quite 6 o'clock. He occupies some salaried position—clerk in a bank, I believe—and she a girl who might have married anybody."

"Honest labor degrades no man, Marion," came the firm, quiet answer. "Even a clerkship is not always to be found, and I would rather break stones in the street than live on money acquired dishonestly or doled out of charity, though in such a case I would ask no woman to share my lot."

"This looks like breaking stones, does it not?" she laughingly answered, letting her own jeweled fingers close over the man's hand where it rested—a hand whose shape betokened its aristocracy, and which was white and soft as a woman's.

At her light touch his strong frame quivered. He bent and let his lips rest an instant caressingly on her hair, for the girl beside him was his affianced wife.

"It could break stones though, dear; and I don't know but that it would make of me a better man. Suppose I lost my money, Marion? Suppose it were all swept away from me in an hour, and I had a position offered me—a position which would enable me to live but very humbly, very much as your friend is going to live—tell me what you would do?"

"You are only talking to try me, Chester, and I hate such questions. In the first place, it is entirely out of reason; for even were it so, papa, you know, is very rich, and our home could always be with him."

"I have said to you, Marion, that I would rather starve than eat the bread of charity. Therefore, putting this possibility aside tell me still what you would do."

Her fingers relapsed their grasp upon his hand. Was there significance in the action? He smiled bitterly as he saw it. His face was very pale now. Except that he still stood behind her chair she must have noticed it.

"You are utterly absurd this afternoon, Chester," she replied, petulantly. "Have I not just told you that Edith Marvine's wedding was more like a funeral than a wedding, and though I presume I shall one day have to attend my own funeral, it will not, I assure you, be as a voluntary agent. Have you nothing more agreeable you can find to say to me?"

The man shook off a certain something which seemed to envelop him in an almost invisible cloud, and he answered with the old, courteous grace which suited him so well, and had made his power with women almost a proverb.

Money always seemed to belong to him by an inherent right. It was so natural that he should be rich. No one could have imaigned Chester Thorley poor. He knew so well how to expend his wealth. He gave it so generously, yet without ostentation, that no man envied him it.

Yet he knew a half hour later, when he left his farewell kiss on Marion Willoughby's beautiful lips, that it was farewell to all his hopes and happiness.

The blow had already fallen. He was a ruined man, with scarce a dollar he could call his own—he who had had no wish ungratified money might procure in all his thirty years of life. It had fallen, too, through no fault of his own, though there was feeble comfort in that. There was comfort, however, in the knowledge that he owed no man, and that he might start afresh in the world with no burden on his broad shoulders or his conscience.

True, there was a deep wound in his heart. He had loved Marion so well that to give her up was to voluntarily renounce God's sunlight. But all her life had been spent amid luxury. It was to her a necessity. Deprived of it, she would fade and droop; and better any lot than to watch her struggle, and know that he had brought it upon her.

Besides, she had made her choice. To her a wedding meant flowers, music, friends, the toilet of the bride. The future, the communion of two hearts, the solemn responsibilities incurred were but secondary considerations.

"Good-by, my darling!" he said, as they parted; but when she added, "Until to-morrow," he answered neither yea nor nay.

"To-morrow" the world knew that Chester Thorley's ship had gone upon the rocks. Many of his business associats would have held out to him a helping hand, but firmly and kindly he refused every offer.

He wrote Marion a few lines, recalling to her mind the conversation of the day before, and releasing her from her vows to him.

"If any good fortune comes to me," he concluded; "you shall hear of it. If I am silent, you may know it is because my life is wrapped in silence and shadow. Bless you, darling, for the light you have cast upon it! It will be like looking into heaven. I dare not see you again—I tested my strength to its full yesterday. God grant that some better man than I may win you. To love you better is not within his power. Nor must you think I blame you that you shrank from sharing the new life upon which I enter. Flowers cannot live without sunlight. Even as I spoke I knew your answer. I only wanted to be sure that I made no mistake in interpreting the best course for your happiness."

And then, with a few more warm, passionately, living words of farewell, the letter closed.

Two years passed, and the little world which had known Chester Thorley so well, knew him no more. He had entirely disappeared. It were as though the sea had opened and swallowed him up.

Marion Willoughby was Marion Willoughby still. If she suffered, she made no sign; but those who had seen the one sparkling stone, which had been the pledge of her engagement to Chester Thorley, noticed that she wore it still, and others, yet more narrow watchers observed that always, when she entered a crowded room, she would take a hasty glance about, as though expecting to find some one not there.

She was yet but twenty-two, a belle and a beauty still. The third winter of his absense she went West to spend several weeks with an aunt.

"I cannot spare you," her father had said when the invitation had come.

But she, going close to him, and laying her head a moment on his breast, had said:

"I think, papa, it would be best."

They were simple words, but he interpreted them aright. The old wound would not cease its bleeding. She wanted to go amid new scenes, so he only kissed her, and bade her remember that the old father awaited her return.

"You have not been through the steel works," some one said to her one day. "It really is a most interesting sight. Will you join a party, if we make up one to visit them, Miss Willoughby?"

"With pleasure," she answered lightly.

He was the great parti of the place. She had heard something of some early disappointment in Marion's life. It was a splendid triumph thus to obliterate it, and already she felt quite sure that the flat lay in the girl's own hands.

The morning appointed for the expedition dawned beautiful and bright. They seemed indeed like drones, intruding upon some busy hive of workers, as they entered the great building and looked about them. Department after department they visited, watching with interest the delicate, subtle machinery and its wonderful workings.

Marion's cheek flushed with interest, and Clay Clayton, noting it, thought he never had seen her look more beautiful.

To-day he determined he must speak, when suddenly he heard a little cry and glancing up, saw her standing quite apart from the group, her eyes ablaze, her lips quivering.

At a little distance from her, adjusting some piece of machinery, was a man in a workman's blouse. Her cry also attracted him, and he looked up.

Their eyes met. His face grew deathly pale, but he gave no other sign of recognition. She went straight towards him, oblivious of all, with hand outstretched.

"Chester!" she said in a voice scarce louder than a whisper. "At last."

He bowed low in response, and took no notice of her hand; but the old, dauntless pride was in the uplifted head and fearless glance.

"Did you know that I was here?" she questioned.

"No," he replied; "I am no longer in your world."

"You will come to see me?"

"I can not."

Here his voice broke a little.

"Mr. Clayton," she said "let me present my friend, Mr. Thorley."

Spite of innate breeding of the man, some of the instinctive surprise at hearing a steel worker addressed by Miss Willoughby as friend, made itself apparent in the manner he yet strove to conceal.

Then the party passed on. He wondered, however, why Marion lingered a moment in the office to address the superintendent some question as they came out into the air. He had meant, too, to ask her, on the way home, the question which all day, and for many days, had been trembling on his lips, but there was a new expression in her eyes and about her mouth which instinctively told him that this was not the time to plead his cause.

Had that fellow inside, who bowed so like a gentleman, been any other than a workman, he might have suspected him as some way responsible. It was quite singular enough as it was that Miss Willoughby should have addressed him as friend. Doubtless some man who had seen better days, and for whom she felt a womanly sympathy.

"Can I see Mr. Thorley?"

The mistress of the humble little cottage in one of Chicago's suburbs looked up, amazed, at the beautiful young lady who asked the question.

"Indeed, I suppose you may, miss. He's gone up to his room, where he spends all his evenings, and not a bit of supper to-night has he touched. Shall I call him down?"

"No; let me go to him."

"It's the first room to the right of the stairs, Miss. He's the only lodger I have, and you are his first visitor."

But the girl heeded not the words. A strange vision she surely was as she stood an instant outside his door, clad in costly velvets and rich furs; then she softly turned the handle and entered.

He did not hear her. He had thrown himself upon his sofa and buried his head in its cushions. He was so still, so motionless, she thought he must be sleeping.

She swiftly crossed the room, and laying her hand gently upon his shoulder, called his name.

"My God!" he cried, and would have started to his feet but that she held him back, falling on her knees beside him.

"Chester," she pleaded, "you would not come to me. My pride is less than yours—my love greater. I have come to you. Did you think that my heart uttered the unworthy words for which you have punished me all these years? I have tried so long to find you. So long and so hopelessly!"

And she bowed her beautiful head and sobbed outright.

"Hush, dear—hush! You should not have come here, Marion. It might compromise you."

"Compromise, me with my future husband? See, Chester!" and she held up the hand on which gleamed the ring, "I have never accepted my freedom."

"My own brave girl," he said, his voice softening even while he girded himself up to the strength of which he stood in such need. "But the heaven you open to me can not be. I am foreman in the works where you saw me to-day, Marion. My knowledge and love of machinery stood me in good stead. I heard of this opening and secured it. To-day I was adjusting some difficult piece of work I dared not trust to the workman. I am in receipt of a liberal salary, which I am laying aside, dear, living as poorly as I can, hoping one day to buy an interest in the business. One or two improvements I have made are rapidly attaining me this goal; but it is still far off. I can not ask you to wait, nor to forget the years of labor which have helped me to reach it.

"I have waited already too long, Chester, —she whispered. "I am ready now to become your wife!"

His face grew deadly white.

"Do not tempt me," he said hoarsely.

"Oh, Chester!" she said. "When I have so much money, why are you so cruel and so proud!"

"I cannot go back to a life of ease and dependence," he answered—"even with you, dear love, to brighten it. Bless you for coming to me, Marion! Bless you for showing me all that a noble woman may be. The memory of this hour will lighten all future years."

"Chester, you do not understand me," she persisted. "I ask you to return to no life of dependence, I will forget that I have a single dollar in the world except what you give me. I will share whatever home you offer me—even this. For better for, worse, darling, we pledged ourselves as sacredly as though already we had stood before God's altar! In God's sight I am your wife! I claim my right to share your dark days as well as those on which the sun of prosperity may shine!"

He strove to answer her, but his voice broke. She had conquered; but, womanlike, she gave to him the glory of the victory as she sobbed out her happiness upon his heart.

A month later there was a quiet wedding, at which were neither flowers nor bridesmaids, nor music; but Marion Willoughby missed nothing. It was only after the ceremony had been performed that Chester showed her a document which had been his wedding gift from the firm he had served so faithfully, and which admitted him as a junior partner from that date. But she smiled half sadly as she looked at it through a mist of tears.

"You said once, dear," she whispered, "that flowers, to live, needed sunlight. My darling, I had not then made the wonderful discovery that love makes sunlight everywhere! With your heart my home, be its outward adornments what they will, I envy no king his palace, no queen her throne!"

"How much did you pay for your new dress?" asked Mrs. Smith. "eight cents a yard; they asked ten cents." "Why." said Mrs. Smith, "it is just like mine, isn't it? But I did better than you. They asked me eighteen cents, and I got it for twelve cents. I got off more than you."

Biggins never loses his gallantry. When he came home how-came-you-so, the other night, and Mrs. B. told him she was ashamed of him. Biggins replied: "Better my wife (hic) should be ashamed of him, than that I should be ashamed of my wife."

TRUE LOVE.

"Amor, che ne la mente mi ragiona."—DANTE
"Amor vien nel bel viso di costei.—PETRARCA

If there can be any one can take my place
And make you happy whom I grieve to grieve,
Think not that I can grudge it, but believe
I do commend you to that nobler grace,
That readier wit than mine, that sweeter face,
Yea, since your riches make me rich, conceive
I too am crowned, while bridal crowns I weave,
And thread the bridal dance with jocund pace.
For if I did not love you, it might be
That I should grudge you some one dear delight.
But since the heart is yours that was mine own,
Your pleasure is my pleasure, right my right,
Your honorable freedom makes me free,
And you companioned I am not alone.

A POLICEMAN'S MISTAKE.

From the Chicago Inter Ocean.

It was a dull rainy day, towards the end of August—one of those days when earth and sky alike are gray and dreary, and the rain-drops pattering against the window sound like human sobs. The clock that hung against the wall pointed to the hour of three in the afternoon, and I was sitting by myself in our little inner office, looking out at the expanse of the dull, gray wall that formed my only prospect from the not over clean window, and thinking. I had read every square inch of type in the newspapers; I had made out all the necessary papers and documents, and now with literally "nothing to do, I was musing about Kitty Elton, and wondering how long it would be before I should be able to marry her.

Dear little Kitty! She was as sweet and as patient as it was in the nature of a woman to be, but I knew it was a hard life for her in that overcrowded milliner's workroom, day after day and month after month, and I longed to set her free from the monotonous captivity. She was a pretty blue-eyed girl of 20, with a dimple in her chin and the sweetest rose on her cheek that ever inspired the pen of a poet. I was no poet, yet I think I understood and appreciated all her womanly grace and delicate beauty as fully as if my heart's thoughts could shape themselves into verse. And it was of them I was thinking when the door opened and Mr. Clenner came in.

Mr. Clenner was our chief,—a dark, silent little man, with square stern mouth and clouded gray eyes, which appeared almost expressionless when they were turned full upon you, and yet which seemed to see everything at a glance. He sat down beside me.

"Meredith," he said, in a quiet subdued tone that was natural to him, "didn't you say you were getting tired of doing nothing?"

"Yes, sir.

"Well, I have something for you to do."

"Something that will bring you both credit and friends, if you manage it skillfully. I had intended to go myself but circumstances happened untowardly, and I shall send you instead."

Bending his head toward me and speaking scarcely above a whisper, he told me the special business on which I was to be sent. There had been, it seems, a series of very heavy forgeries lately committed, with a boldness and audacity that fairly seemed to set the authorities at defiance. For some time he had been in doubt as to the exact perpetrator of the crime, but after much quiet investigation and casting hither and tither, he had detected the hidden spring—one Perley Matteson—who had skilfully eluded all pursuit, and was now somewhere hidden in the northeastern portion of the state. His whereabouts had been ascertained as nearly as possible, and it was for me to go quietly up and apprehend him before he should become aware of our knowledge of all his movements.

I sat listening to all the various details of our plan as they were sketched out by Mr. Clenner. The reward that had been privately offered was high—my heart leaped as I reflected how much nearer it would bring me to Kitty Elton, nor did the enterprise seem particularly difficult to accomplish.

"Do you think you can do it?" Mr. Clenner asked, after the whole thing had been laid before me.

"Yes, sir. When shall I start?"

"Now—within half an hour."

"Yes, why not?"

I could think of no sufficient reason except one, which I did not care to communicate to my superior—the longing wish to see Kitty once more before I started.

"Just as you decide, Mr. Clenner, of course," I said, raising. "If I take the 4 o'clock express I shall be there by daylight to-morrow morning."

"Yes, and that is altogether the best plan. He will not remain long in any one place just at present, depend upon it, and what you have to do must be done at once."

All through that long night journey I mused myself upon the task that lay before me. The house to which I was directed was in the village of Drownville—the residence of Mrs. Matteson, the mother of the audacious forger. If help was needed I was fully authorized to call for it upon the constabularly authorities of Drownville, but I expect to need none.

The rosy dawn was just finishing the eastern sky when I alighted, stiff, weary. and jaded, from the train at the little way station of Drownville.

"Can you direct me to Mrs. Mattleson's place?" I asked of the sleepy station-master, who was yawning behind the little aperture of the ticket office.

"Matteson—Mrs. Matthsoo; I don't know her, but I guess likely I can tell you where she lives. Just you follow the main street of the village out about half a mile, and ye'll come to a patch o' woods, with bars at the fence. Go through them bars a little way further on, and ye'll see a little yaller house, just the last place in the world where you'd expect to see a house. That's where Mrs. Matteson lives."

I thanked my informant, and set out on a brisk walk, carrying my traveling bag. It was quite a distance ere I emerged from the suburbs of the "main street" into a quiet and secluded road, or, rather lane. The "patch o' woods" and the "little yaller house," a cream-colored cottage, literally overgrown with honeysuckles—rewarded my search, and as I knocked at the door a clock somewhere inside struck 7.

A decent-looking, elderly woman in widow's weeds came to the door.

"Is Mr. Matteson in?" Mr. Perley?"

"No," she answered, quickly, with, as I imagined, rather a confused look. I did not believe her, and asked quietly:

"When do you expect him home?"

"Not at present."

Apparently she expected me to go away, but instead I stepped in.

"Mother," asked a soft voice at the head of the stairs, "who is it?"

And then for the first time I became aware that some one had been watching our coloquy from the head of the stairs—a young girl, dressed, like the mother in deep black, with very brilliant black eyes and a profusion of jet black ringlets.

"Someone to see your brother."

She came half way down the stairs, pushing back her curls with one hand, and looking at me with wondrous eyes. Even then her beauty struck me as I stood gazing at her.

"Terry is not at home," she said hurriedly. "He has gone away. We do not know when he will return."

Evidently the mother and daughter were in the secret of Matteson's villainy, and doing their best to screen him from its consequences. My heart bled for both of them; but it was no time to indulge in sentimental pity. Speaking as briefly as could, I told them it was my duty to compel them to remain where they were while I searched the house.

Mrs. Matteson sat down, pale and trembling; her daughter colored high.

"Mother," she said, "why do you stand by and listen to such slanders? It is false! Let this man search the house if he will; my brother is as innocent as I am!"

No opposition was offered to my search. It was entirely fruitless, however—there was nowhere any trace of the flown bird. Nevertheless, I concluded to remain there quietly for a day or two, to see what a little waiting might bring forth.

The same afternoon, Clara Matteson came in, as I sat by the piazza window, keeping a quiet watch on all the surroundings.

"Mr. Meredith," she said softly, "mother thinks I have been rude to you. She says it was not your fault, personally, that you were sent here—on such a mistake, and perhaps she is right. I am sorry I have hurt your feelings."

The pretty penitent way in which she spoke quite won my heart, and a few questions on me part seemed to unlock the hidden recesses of her confidence. She talked at first shyly, but afterwards with more assurance of herself, her absent brother, and her mother, giving me a thousand artless little family details which I almost dreaded to hear. The twilight talk was one of the pleasantest of my by no means universally pleasant life, and I was considerably annoyed when it was broken in upon by the arrival of the Drownville constables who were to watch through the night. At the sound of their footsteps on the piazza floor, Clara rose up and sat down again, confused and frightened.

"O, Mr. Meredith—those men—"

"Be easy, Miss Matteson," I said; "you shall in no way be annoyed by them. Your privacy shall not be broken in upon, believe me."

"I know I am silly," faltered Clara, "but oh! it seems so dreadful!"

My orders to the men were brief and succint. I stationed them as seemed best to me, and then returned to spend the evening with Miss Matteson. And when I was at length left alone I could not help thinking—God forgive me—how much more winning and graceful she was than poor Kitty Elton.

At length an answer came to my report to Mr. Clenner—it was short and to the purpose:

"Come back—you are only losing time. If the bird has flown we must look elsewhere for him."

I read the missive with a pang. Clara Matteson's cheeks deepened in color as I announced my departure to her

"You have been far kinder than we dared to hope, Mr. Meridith," she said as I held her hand in mine.

"You will think of me sometimes Clara?"

The reader will easily see how our intimacy had progressed. She smiled, hung her head, and taking a pair of scissors from the table, severed one bright tress from the abundant tresses that hung over her forehead.

"Keep this, Mr. Meridith, in memory of me."

Was I foolish to press the jetty ringlet to my lips ere I laid it close against my heart?' Clara evidently thought I was—for she had laughed, but did not seem displeased.

Mr. Clinner seemed annoyed when I got back to the bureau—rather an unreasonable proceeding on his part, for I certainly did all that man could do under the circumstances.

"We have been mistaken all the way through, it seems," he said, biting his lip. "Strange—very strange—I was never mistaken before in my calculations. Well, we must try again."

I went to Kitty Elton's that night. She received me with a sweet, shy sadness of welcome that should have made me the happiest man in the world; but it did not. Clara Matteson's dark beauty seemed to stand between me and her like a visible barrier. When I took my leave there were tears in her eyes.

"Kitty, you are crying!"

"Because you are changed. Edward, you do not love me as well as you did."

"Kitty, what nonsense!"

I was vexed with her, simply because I knew her accusation was true. But I kissed her again and took my leave, moody and dissatisfied.

When I reached the office next morning Mr. Clenner was not there.

"He had gone to Drownville," said my fellow detective; "he went last night."

"To Drownville?"

I was seriously annoyed. Did Mr. Clenner distrust the accuracy of my reports. Or did he imagine that I was unable to institute a thorough and complete investigation of the premises?

"It's very strange," I mused aloud.

Jones laughed.

"Well," he said, "you know Clenner has a way of doing strange things. Depend upon it, he has good reasons for his conduct."

I was sitting at my desk two days subsequently, when the door glided noiselessly open and Clenner himself entered.

"You are back again, sir? and what luck?"

"The best."

"You don't mean to say it. Edward Meredith, I knew I could not be entirely mistaken. Perley Matteson is in the next room—half an hour from now he will be in prison."

"Where did you apprehend him?"

"At home in his mother's house."

"But——"

"He was there all the time you remained there. Ned, my boy, you've made a blunder for once; but don't let it happen again."

"What do you mean, sir?"

For reply he opened the door of the private inner apartment, his own special sanctum. A slight boyish figure leaned against the window smoking a cigarette, with black curls tossed back from a marble white brow, and brilliant eyes. He mockingly inclined his head as I stared at him, with a motion not unfamiliar to me.

"Clara Matteson!"

"Yes," he said, in a soft, sarcastic voice; "Clara Matteson or Perley Matteson, or whatever you choose to call me! Many thanks for your politeness, Detective Meredith; and, if you would like another lock of hair——"

I turned away, burning scarlet, while Mr. Clenner closed the door.

"Never mind, my boy, it will be a lesson to you," he said laughing. "He makes a very pretty girl, but I am not at all susceptible."

What a double-dyed fool I have been! I had lost the reward—failed in the estimation of my fellow-officers, and behaved like a brute to poor Kitty—and all for what?

I went to Kitty and told her the whole story, and to my surprise the dear faithful little creature loved me just as well as ever. "I won't be jealous of Perley Matteson, Edward," she said, smiling. "Whatever I might be of his sister. And, dearest, don't be discouraged. I'll wait as long as you please, and you will be a second Mr. Clenner yet."

She was determined to look on the bright side of things, this little Kitty of mine! But I felt the mortification none the less keenly, although, as Mr. Clenner said, it would undoubtedly prove a good lesson to me.

Perley Matteson's girlish beauty is eclipsed in the state's prison—nor do I pity him. The stake for which he played was high—and he lost.

Never before, within the memory of that famous oldest inhabitant, was so much buildings going on in New York and Brooklyn. A recent count here showed that building enough are going up to make homes for 10,174 families, or 50,874 persons. Many of these are immense and costly "French flat" houses, accommodating from 20 or 30 to 150 families each. They range from 7 to 15 stories high, and on more than one of them the outlay counts up among the millions. In Brooklyn 1,922 buildings, more than six for each working day, were completed last year, at a cost of more than $8,500,000. In the first six months of this year 1,165 were finished; in the same months last year 800.

WELL DYKED DUTCHMEN,

Who Bid Defiance to the Raging Sea, and Even Propose to Capture More Sand from Its Depths.

A Queer Mixture of the Monotonous and Picturesque in the Scenery and Curious Costumes of the People.

Very Godly Country, if the Old Adage Relative to Cleanliness Hold True.

AMSTERDAM, Holland, Special Correspondence, Sept. 1.—This is the only country in the world where war always prevails. The inhabitants, though they are not warlike in bearing, never know a moment of real peace. The siege is perpetual; the peril imminent and constant. The besieged, inheriting the savage conflict from generation to generation, have thrown up huge fortifications a thousand miles long, and begirt themselves with fortresses stronger than those which flank the Thames or those which protect the great harbors of France. An army of observation marches and countermarches, never relaxing vigilance, while the foe, now advancing and now resting, ever thunders angrily at the gates. More than 500 years ago the fight began; it will continue, undiminished in ferocity, 500 years hence. The foe is the sea; his allies, the rivers and the lakes. The Hollander says in the intervals of this strange conflict: "God made the sea; we made the land." He appreciates, as nobody else can, the fact that nature is the constant enemy of man and that civilization is man-made—the result of chaining her fierce moods and refining her coarse methods. Holland was originally a sort of archipelago—a vast sea made shallow by the alluvium washed down from Central Europe through the changing channels of great streams. The area was equal to that of Massachusetts and Connecticut. Here and there the sand and mud washed level with the surface of the water and on this trembling raft the people clustered, and grew precarious food, and spawned broods of surprised children and fought over for firmer footing. Now they drove back the ocean; now the ocean drove them back and drowned them out. For many centuries they have slept on the battle field with weapon in hand and armor on, never relaxing effort and never feeling for a moment secure. The incessant combat has made them a robust, patient, vigorous and overcoming people. But the victories have not been all on one side. Every ten years, or so, the savage sea would storm the fortifications and drown 10,000 or 20,000 of the farmers. Then, when the sand dunes were too low for defense, they built a great system of dykes, reaching far beneath the tides and far below, the wonder of the world. Still the brigand Meuse would steal through its walls, or the Zyder Zee would burst its prison, or the barbarian sea would leap its barriers, and there was a destructive inundation about once in seven years for centuries. Once 75,000 people were drowned, at another time 100,000—a slaughter three times as great as that at Waterloo. More than once since that great battle was fought 25,000 Hollanders have been swept away on a single overflow. But the survivors were obstinate. They drove back the sea and rebuilt their villages. They strengthened the defences along the coast, and erected windmills upon them which incessantly pumped out the water and poured it into the sea. They put the rampant rivers in strait-jackets of solid masonry, divided them so that they would be harmless, and taught them docility. Then they constructed walls around the great lakes, started wind-mills on them, and pumped the water out and poured it into the sea. In this way they have reclaimed more fertile land than there is in the State of Rhode Island. It was like draining Lake George. An enterprise is now on foot to build a dyke across the great inland gulf, the Zuider Zee, pump the lower half dry and expose to the sun a vast area of arable land. It would be below the level of the sea, of course, but the Dutch farmers are accustomed to plow below the level of the keels of the ocean steamers off the coast. Significant, indeed, are the arms of Holland—a lion swimming in the sea.

NOT VERY PICTURESQUE.

I rode 100 miles across the country yesterday. It is about as monotonous as the Jersey flats. I don't see how on earth it is that Dutch artists, old and new, have succeeded in expressing so much beauty and sentiment in pictures of these level lands, which possess intrinsically so little sentiment or beauty. Most of our through the polders—land which was once the bottom of the sea. No fences anywhere. Along the railroad, on the land side, was a broad, deep ditch, and at right angles with this, other ditches at intervals of a few rods, flowed level full of water and disappeared in the grass far inland. On the ocean side of the train a huge embankment rose, and sails were visible above it, and foamy, waves leaped up here and there, and peeped over jealously at the fertile acres and the broad-backed brindle cows grazing. On the embankment windmills, with enormous wings, like the sails of a merchantman, worked their pumps in sluggish confidence of victory. Every fifty rods along the ditches wooden gates rose, to cover small bridges set there for convenience—about the only object, except the cows, to break the vision. Attempts are being made to grow trees, and, at rather distant intervals, a little house is set, and the occupant has carted on enough dry vegetable mould to make himself a garden.

SPECIMENS OF DUTCH NEATNESS.

All that I have ever heard about the neatness of these Dutch people seems justified. He who rises early shall see the inhabitants swarming like bees, armed with the implements of renovation. Men are on their knees on the sidewalks; women with scrubbing brushes cling to the windows with violent gestures; the knockers shine like gold. At the church door lies a mat of sewed rags, and by the side of the mat stands a man, his face furrowed with anxiety, and when I pass without seeing it he chatters at me a word or two of guttoral expostulation, and, pointing to the mat, turns me back to wipe my feet on it. There is not a speck of mud in the streets, but there is a little dust, and the care-worn guardian knows that dust is a subtle enemy that loves to fly up and roost on the stained-glass oriels and the carven pulpit. These Dutchmen fear dirt more than any other invader. In the local records is the story how Napoleon and Alexander of Russia, forming their brigand partnership in 1808, met at Utrecht to sign the papers. They were about to enter a house for conference, when they were met by a woman who placed herself sternly in the way. "Gentlemen," she said, "you can't come in here unless you put these stockings on," and she handed each a pair of coarse stockings to pull over his boots. They laughed, conceded the point, and entered thus equipped. I have not seen one of the wonderful dairies which are the pride of Holland, but I am told of one by an acquaintance.

"She took me down to see the dairy," says he. "There were twenty cows, each in a pretty little room by herself. There were no stalls and no mangers. The rooms were finished in the native woods of the Rhine valley, and much of it was polished. Each cow's tail was fastened up to a ring in the wall, and a brook of fresh water ran through every room. The floor was without a speck, and mosquito bars and neat chintz curtains hung at the windows. There was a straw mat at each door, on which every visitor was expected to wipe his feet if they were clean; if they were soiled, he was expected to go outside and make himself presentable before approaching the cows."

SOME QUEER COSTUMES.

The locomotive of this era is the greatest vandal the world has ever seen. Alaric the Visigoth was a mischievous fellow who turned and overturned, but he came to-day and went to-morrow, and when he departed old things were restored. The locomotive is destroying the picturesqueness of the world. Even here in the Netherlands costumes are conforming more and more every year to the prevailing fashions of France and England. The nobility of Holland are not distinguishable by their dress from the ladies and gentlemen of London and New York, and the wealthy burghers have followed suit. Only the peasants (that is, the farmers), and the sailors still preserve the curious garb which we have seen pictures of; and so insulated are the various provinces by water that the dress of the people of one section is a constant source of surprise and amusement to the people of another. It was odd enough, at the exhibition yesterday, to see the visitors from Zealand in the South and of those from Friesland on the North inspecting one another with as much curiosity as if they had come from opposite ends of the earth. The costume that attracted the most attention was perhaps that of the rich peasant women of the north. This, in its purest form, consists of a short skirt of thick stuff, padded with pillows at the hip (unless they have some dreadful hip disease) with a silk apron of bright green, or yellow, or purple, or red, reaching exactly to the bottom of the skirt; a bodice of black velvet, laced across a white bosom at the front, sometimes with silver chains reaching around under the arms, like the Swiss. Her head-dress is a startling vision. In the first place she wears her hair slightly banged in front, and over this a helmet or casque of silver or gold—a solid plate, bent to the head and covering it like an outer skull. Scarcely a bit of hair is visible. Across the forehead is bound a gold band an inch or so wide, its middle set with a heavy brooch of gold and gems, like an old-fashioned breastpin. The ear-rings are not worn in the ears, but hung from the ends of this coronet, dangling just over the eyes in such a way as sometimes to obstruct the line of vision. These pendants are as bulky, costly and long as the wearer can afford—heavy plates of topaz, amethyst and emerald hinged together, and set sometimes with pearls, rubies or diamonds, covering both cheeks. Over the helmet and coronet is worn a demure white linen cap, not so snug as to conceal the splendor, its white cape falling to the shoulders, and its forward tabs starched stiff and turned square back and upward around the head again, leaving two sharp points sticking directly out in front beyond the face. Still over this, far up and back, an elaborate bonnet is perched—sometimes a Parisian affair of silk and lace and ornithological corpses, and sometimes a high, floral, crooked concern, like a truncated coal-scuttle with the jim-jams.

UNIQUE HEADGEAR.

Frequently the jewelry store around the face is modified and enlarged by the addition of a silver bed-spring, sticking directly out in front from each temple. I don't know whether this ornament actually was a bed-spring before being set to its present service, but it looks precisely like that useful article, being a spiral of white wire, describing a cone three or four inches in diameter at the base, and reaching out in front some six or eight inches. When thus equipped, the fair maiden or matron looks as if she had taken to herself a pair of effective horns, and, though I have heard nothing about the significance of the decoration, it is obviously adopted as a means of defence against the amorous lunkheads of this neighborhood. I think a woman who really meant business could learn to swing those horns so as to hit an intruder in the eye every time. It is a wonder that King William Alexander Paul Frederick Lewis and his parliament do not enact a law prohibiting, under severe penalties, the wearing of such a dangerous piece of headgear. It shows how the Dutchman must have been trampled under foot by the Dutch women, when they have not spirit enough left to rise in rebellion against such a monstrous infringement of their rights.

A good many of the men wear round felt hats, with bands variously embroidered in silk; jackets of dark cloth, short and light, opening in front to display a vest embroidered with red, yellow and green, and buttoned with a row of silver coins; short breeches of the same color as the jacket, bound around the waist by a girdle furnished with a heavy boss of chased silver; a scarlet cravat, and fine woolen stockings to the knee. In the case of the fishermen the breeches had a most exaggerated contour, drawn snug at the belt, but expanding around the hips into half a dozen breadths of cloth, plaited and puffed.

THE SIGNIFICANT HELMETS.

On inquiry I learned that the gold and silver helmets and the jeweled fillet across the forehead with the pendants at its ends, are worn mainly by the wives and daughters of the rich peasants, and are, in themselves, a sign of wealth. The ambition of the farmer's daughter is to acquire for her dowry a golden helmet. This is sometimes presented by the lover on his acceptance, or, if he cannot afford a gold one, he presents a silver one of greater or less thickness. As I expressed curiosity concerning the curious fashion, my landlord called my attention to a girl arrayed for the fair yesterday.

"Is that really gold?" I asked.

"It is really gold—fourteen or sixteen carats fine," he said.

"Who is she?"

"She is a servant girl in that family in the brick house at the corner," he answered. "She is from Gelderland, beyond the Zuyder Zee. I knew her before she came here. That casque was presented to her by her sweetheart a month ago. It is a fine one, and cost three or four thousand gulden."

"Two thousand dollars!" I exclaimed. "He must be rich. Who is he?"

"No, he is not rich; but he is industrious and saving, like most Dutchmen. He is a common laborer—a tilemaker down at Delft. He has laid aside, in little savings, enough to buy his bride this fine outfit."

"Do women ever sell this equipment when hard pushed?"

"Oh, yes; but they must be very hard-pushed first. Some lose their characters and then sell their helmets and become astray. It is odd," he added, thoughtfully, "that women have a way of wearing this headdress which indicates their character. Perhaps you do not know?"

I expressed curiosity, and he went on.

"It is not difficult to classify the women from this door as they go by—not accurately, but sufficiently. All who are entirely virtuous, or wish to be thought so, wear their helmets or caps snug to their heads, and scarcely let a bit of their hair show. When they release a lock, then they are slightly fast, and their increasing willingness to make the acquaintance of gentlemen is indicated by the increasing disorder of their front hair. There is a tacit understanding to this effect all over Holland, and although laws have been passed to prohibit it, the custom is too strong for prohibition. A woman who wears much of her front hair out from under her helmet is considered as inviting improper proposals upon the street."

HOW THE CITIES LOOK.

Amsterdam and Rotterdam look like no other cities in the world. They have hydrocephalus, like Venice—oceans of water everywhere. Amsterdam is built on some eighty islands, connected by 300 bridges across the muddy ditches they call canals. The buildings mainly are of unpainted brick, with gable-ends to the streets, and they are erected, like those of Venice, on millions of piles driven into the mud. But this alluvial deposit is not so firm as the sandy sediment in the Adriatic lagoons, and so it happens that almost all of the houses here and in Rotterdam are out of plumb. You cross a bridge and instinctively hesitate to advance, for it seems as if the buildings ahead were about to tumble down and crush you. On both sides of the street they bend outward towards each other, so that their cornices are two or three feet nearer than their bases. You gather courage and proceed, and further on you see other houses bowing. Here is a tall, toppling chimney, and around it in a circle are various houses gravely saluting it. None of the buildings seem to fall down—at least I did not detect any in the act—but they rise and engage in their bricky salaams at almost every angle from the perpendicular, and in utter disregard of the feelings of wayfarers. Crazy little steamboats traverse the dirty little canals; great brick warehouses boldly bend over and look down into their turbid mirrors; merchantmen from Java stick their yards up through the branches of sycamore trees upon the banks; here and there ships climb up the ladder-locks; here and there windmills churn the air and pour the water out into the sea. This is a queer old town. But I should think the Hollanders would wash their canals.

W. A. CROFFUT.

THY NAME.

I told the rose thy name—it blushed and stirred;
  Its petals trembled as in ecstasy.
I cried thy name aloud—and [illegible] the bird
  Burst into song within the thick-leaved tree.

I spake it when the moon was gray and cold,
  And straight from out his east up shot the sun;
I spake it to the night—the clouds that rolled
  Above dispersed, the stars came one by one.

Should any whisper it when on my face
  The black earth lies, calm sleeping under ground,
I think my heart would beat apace,
  And that my lips would tremble at the sound.

And if before the gates of heaven I came,
  And could for my own worth no entrance win,
I think that then, if I should name thy name,
  The eternal doors would stir and let me in.

SUMMER STROLLS IN FRANCE

Among Some of the Picturesque Watering Places at Which the Parisians Take Their Summer Outing.

A New and Eminently French Novel With Which Dames and Damsels Have Been Whiling Away Their Time.

TROUVILLE, Special Correspondence, Aug. 25, 1883.—I am on a voyage of investigation along the coast, studying morals and summer manners at French watering places. Thus far into the heart of Normandy have I marched without any great amount of impediment, and I like it very much. Etretat is a place for painters and respectable people who are happiest when they are gossiping scandal about their neighbors. Along about the year 1840 three Parisian artists set out to explore the channel coast on foot between Havre and Dunkerque. The country was but little known excepting to the native residents, and the journey thus undertaken by our bold excursionists was a real voyage of discovery, which, in those days, was something really adventurous. Before leaving, they agreed with their artist friends at Paris that, whenever they discovered a neighborhood which seemed especially rich in artistic motifs, they were to mark with a white cross the first house in the village. Saint Adresse, where Sarah Bernhardt has her country residence, was the first place discovered, and it was marked, as it deserved to be; but when they reached Etretat they were so impressed with the magnificent view that they enthusiastically marked three big white crosses on the first blank wall they came across. This burst of admiration came near costing them dearly. A woman of the place, who had seen the strangers marking the house of her neighbor, ran over to warn him that some deviltry was going on; the owner of the house made such a fuss about it that the whole village was convinced that our three painters were three wicked sorcerers; and but for the majesty of the law, represented in a solitary gendarme, the Parisans would have been stoned to death. As it was, they were marched off to Monsieur le Maire, who was at last induced to give them their liberty. Now Etretat fully deserved its three white crosses. Placed in the center of some of the most wonderful scenery that can be imagined, the old Norman village lies stretched out in a long line between two gigantic cliffs, which jut out into the sea as though to protect the little thatched-roofed houses all overgrown with moss. Although it has been nearly half a century since it came under subjection to Paris, and has been, so to speak, converted into one of the suburbs of the capital, Etretat is still, when seen from the sea, one of the most picturesque nooks on this coast. The scene has remained as nature made it, in spite of man's attempt to improve on her handiwork; but instead of the simple and moving drama of the sea it is now the comedy of the beach, made detestable very often by the habit which so many American ladies have of tittle-tattling. The performance lasts for about two months, and even the natives of the spot take a part in it.

THE INFLUENCE OF CIVILIZATION.

While the white cliffs of Aval and Amont still stand out against the constantly changing horizon, and while the Aiguille still points majestically straight upwards, the old fishing boats are freshly painted and disguised every year; the caloges, or fisherman's cottages, are transformed into cafes and salons de conversation; instead of village women mending nets, we see fashionable ladies embroidering, reading and sketching. Formerly it was the village folk who went down to the beach to watch for the return of their men with the incoming tide, but now it is the Parisonnes who sit along the beach and find beauty in half-naked, hairy-breasted, knock-kneed gentlemen. The old fishermen have become professional bathers; the lads of the village study painting; mothers' scheme to marry off their daughters, and the maidens dream of entering the Paris conservatoire. All day long there passes a procession of donkeys, carrying parties of young people from the Bois de la Passee to the Chapelle de Bon-Secours. There is room for all who wish to traverse the little tunnel which leads through the cliff of Amont to the Chaudron, and there is plenty of cold veal, sausages, stale bread and bad wines for all who like to go picnicking. Etretat is, however, the village d'artist that is most assiduously frequented by amateur painters. I asked the number of artists of all kinds in the place this season, but the person whom I questioned could not answer me. "But there were over 400 here last year, by actual count," said he; and I don't doubt it. Yet it was only the other day that I heard a great lady say that art was dying out. The old inn of Mother Blanquet, or that of "La belle Ernestine," may not be any longer in existence, but the ghosts of Lepoittevin, of Diaz, Philippe Rousseau, Landelle, Courbet, Bida, Alphonse Karr and a host of others, artists and litterateurs, are over and around the place, and Etretat will long remain one of the most charming spots that pen or pencil has ever attempted to describe.

AT TROUVILLE.

I enjoyed myself most heartily at Havre for a few days, and then a boat built to accommodate 250 passengers brought about a thousand of us across the mouth of the Seine and into Trouville. This watering place, standing at the foot of a verdant hill covered by elegant villas in every style of picturesque architecture and surrounded by gardens as luxuriant in flowers and as umbrageous as those in America, with a long stretch of golden sand before it, is the one par excellence of the beau monde and the demi monde of Paris. It is the gayest, the most delightful place I have ever visited; for one can be at Trouville wise or wicked, moral or immoral, slow or fast, as he or she may select, and there is room for all opinions and pleasures; and the hotels are good. The casino at Trouville is not an ornamental building, but it is useful and is well patronized. There is an excellent concert every afternoon and evening, a ball twice a week, operatic and dramatic performances very often, and gambling day and night. When the tide is up thousands upon thousands of persons go in bathing and swimming. The beach is divided into three parts—one for the males alone, one for the ladies and one for both sexes. There are some good swimmers here, and one of the best is a young American girl from Detroit, who tells me she learned in Lake Erie. One of the great pleasures of the place, after those of the casino and bathing, is the fishing. At low tide it is great fun for the elegantes to go out in short—yes, very short, but at the same time most charming—toilets to gather mussels on the black rocks up by the hotel. Another sport is "la chasse de l'equille," which is a sort of small lamprey abounding on these shores after each high tide. When the sea goes out this little silver eel burrows into the sand to await the next high tide, and then it is that we'uns go out with our little fork and basket to secure our finny prey. They are, when cooked, a great delicacy. Another amusement is to seat one's self under a mammoth umbrella and read the latest French novel. By actual count I saw some twenty odd persons with the novel, Autour de Mariage in their hands yesterday afternoon. This book is the latest sensation, and before leaving Paris I got me a copy of the twenty-fifth addition. Its author writes on the nom de plume of Gyp, but it is now known that she is the Countess de Martel. She had already published "La Vertu de la Baronne, Ce qui Femme Veut and the Petit Bob; and this, her latest work, is being dramatized for production at the Gymnase theater, with the beautiful Jane Hadding in the leading role. This is a naughty book—not so naughty as some French works which I have read in my idle moments, but rather too lively for a Sunday school library. The cover is illustrated with the representation of a lady on horseback, leaping over over a lot of astonished-looking people. Well, I read this book stretched out on the sand facing the ocean, with the murmur of the waves singing their eternal lullaby in my ears, and the air filled with the silvery voices of little children building sand forts on the beach.

A CHARMING PLOT.

Autour de Mariage is composed of twenty-two scenes in dialogue, in which Mlle. Paulette, who becomes Mme. d'Alaly, takes the principal part. Before her marriage she says: "I will be unfaithful to my husband;" and the wedding tour is hardly begun before she is already quite disposed to begin where she ends. And even before her marriage, at the soiree de contract, and at the man dressmaker's, she speaks in a way that leaves no doubt as to what destiny has in store for Monsieur d'Alaly. This Paulette is a compound of Mlle. Benoiton, Frou-Frou and Renee Mauperin, with something more spicy, more Vie Parisienne than any of them. And the authoress scatters red pepper through her pages with a lavish hand, like a young cook who is afraid of not sufficiently flavoring his sauces. Frou-Frou and Renee were at least anxious to repair the faults they committed, but Paulette is absolutely heartless. She is a pretty little animal, coldly vicious to her marrow, as corrupt in thought as she is in her words, and yet she is supposed to be a refined, well-bred French lady. The noble authoress frankly sets her heroine before us at the very start, in the chapter entitled "Conseils d'une Mere," in which Madame d'Hauterstan, on the eve of her daughter's marriage, tries to prepare the latter for the change that is about to take place in her existence. "I say, mamma," replies Paulette, "to-morrow will be a quite sufficiently disagreeable day; it is quite useless that I should begin to bore myself to-night;" and she adds a wish that it was the same hour on the next day; "for then I will have no one to bore me but my husband, and I'll undertake to manage him." No chance is missed to show how much Paulette knows. M. d'Alaly's name is Joseph. She tells her mother that the first thing she is going to do is to make him change it. "No man should be called Joseph; it is shameful." When the wedding journey begins, and D'Alaly begs her to call him by his Christian name, her reply is: "That is the rub;" and says she won't do it because the name Joseph is identified with a most ridiculous story, referring to the affair between Potiphar's wife and the young man that ran away from her embraces. M. d'Alaly has another Christian name, Antoine, but that does not please her either, for it is identified with another one who resisted temptation; but, she says, "all the saints are not idiots." The morning after her wedding night Paulette indulges in a long monologue, which includes so many naughty observations that, though I am neither a Joseph nor an Anthony, I positively do not dare to translate her reflections. Along with all this that she says to her husband, what she says to her male friends, to the artist for whom she poses as Hero, the priestess of Venus, with the slang that she mixes up with it, there is enough to make a whole regiment of regular cavalry blush. And yet this book, originally published in a weekly journal which has a circulation of 175,000, was written by a lady of fashion! Well, well, everybody seems anxious to read it; for, they say, "It is so amusing."

AT DEAUVILLE.

Deauville is merely a prolongation of the watering place in which I am now sojourning, and hence this village is sometimes called Trouville-Deauville. But Deauville, which has a casino of its own, is really a different sort of a place to Trouville. It was the Duc de Morny, the bastard half-brother of Napoleon III., who made it known to the amusement world. He purchased land, erected houses, and laid out a race course. So as to give to Deauville the tone of ducal Goodwood, and to let it be a dependency of Trouville, as Goodwood is of Brighton, he made this course a perfect one, just as he was himself a perfect man of fashion. Twenty Years with the Women would not be an inappropriate title for a chapter in the annals of Deauville—a chapter in which would be found the names of all the great ladies of fashion who have sojourned there, or who have passed through the place. First of all we would read the names of that inimitable trio, Mmes. de Metternich, de Pourtales and de Galliffet, the three true queens of fashion, whose reign seems eternal. Time was when a certain great lady of the Faubourg Saint Germain had a villa at Trouville with fourteen sleeping rooms in it, and a stable at Deauville in which there were four and twenty thoroughbred race horses. Those were the days when crinoline was still in all its glory. One day the Marquise de Galliffet made her appearance at the races in a close-fitting dress. What a hurrah there must have been, and how beautiful she must have looked. Some protested, for fashion is implacable, but fashion is also very good, for it changes our tastes, our way of looking at things, and thus prolongs our pleasures by varying and renewing them. Those were the days of the great hats a la bergere, transparent dresses of grenadine or black lace over cherry or yellow skirts, or of white skirts with pink or blue transparent stuff on the outside. There were also enormous Louis XIII. hats that seemed to have been copied from pictures by Rembrandt, very becoming, but terribly in the way of those who sat behind them. Times have changed. The duke is dead; Deauville erected a statue to him, and horse racing is the life of the place.

To-night I shake the sand of this deliciously wicked town off my feet, and start for Houlgate. There is quite an American colony down there, and I'm going to the place to give the dear old gossips a chance to overhaul my reputation. The road is most of the way up hill. Some ladies of my acquaintance are going to drive to Houlgate in a carriage. I'm going to walk. We are going to see Houlgate there first.

How McPherson Died.

Ramsdell's Letter: I have still something to say about Gresham. He was, as you know, himself in the army—an officer of some rank. He was with Gen. McPherson at Atlanta, in July, 1864. He was wounded, and McPherson ordered him to the rear, and ordered some of his (McP.'s) staff to accompany him for safety. They took a circuitous route to avoid the enemy, McPherson telling the way and saying he had no use for his staff officers. When Gresham arrived at the railway station he was lying on a stretcher, when there was a good deal of bustle and a big pine box was brought in and placed beside Gresham. He recognized it as an army coffin and asked who it contained. He was shocked and almost paralyzed with the answer, "Gen. McPherson." Poor McPherson, on that unhappy 22d of July, was shot from ambuscade. I take the following paragraph from a lately-published letter of Gen. Sherman's to the adjutant general, referring to McPherson's death:

> At the time of this fatal shot he was on horseback placing his troops in position, near the city of Atlanta, and was passing by a cross road from a moving column toward the flank of troops that had already been established on the line. He quitted me a few moments before and was on his way to see in person to the execution of my orders. About the time of this sad event the enemy had sallied from his intrenchments around Atlanta, and had by a circuit got to the left and rear of this very line and had begun an attack which resulted in serious battle, so that Gen. McPherson fell in battle, booted and spurred, as the gallant knight and gentleman should wish.

A BUNDLE OF LETTERS.

Strange how much sentiment
Clings like a fragrant scent
To these love letters pent
  In their pink colors.

Day after day they came,
Feeding love's fickle flame:
Now she has changed her name—
  Then, we were lovers.

Loosen the silken band
Round the square bundle, and See what a dainty hand
  Scribbled to fill it
Full of facetious chat;
Fancy how long she sat
Molding the bullets that Came with each billet!

Ah, I remember still
Time that I used to kill
Waiting the postman's shrill,
  Heart-stirring whistles,
Calling vague doubts to mind,
Whether or no I'd find
That he had left behind
  One of her missals.

Seconds become an age
At this exciting stage:
Two eager eyes the page
  Scan for a minute;
Then, with true lover's art,
Study it part by part,
Until they know my heart
  Everything in it.

What is it all about?
Dashes for words left out
Pronouns beyond a doz
  Very devoted
Howell's she's just beg
Dobson her heart has won
Locker and Tennyson
  Frequently quot.

Criss-cross the reading goes
Rapturous rhyme and pro
Words which I don't suppo
  Look very lar
Books on the "ologies:"
Then there's a tiny frieze
Full of sweets in a squeeze,
  Worked on the margin.

Lastly—don't pause to laugh—
That is her autograph
Signing this truce for half
  Her heart's surrender;
Post-scriptum, one and two—
Desserts—the dinner's through—
Linking the "I" and "You"
  In longings tender.

Such is the type of all
Save one, and let me call
Brief notice to this small
  Note neatly written:
'Tis but a card, you see,
Gently informing me
That it can never be!—
  This is the mitten!

LAND OF CACTUS AND PALM.

More About Mexico, with Especial Reference to Facts About the Ownership of Land.

A List of Golden Opportunities Whereby Men of Enterprise Might Coin Money.

MONTEREY, Estado de Nuevo Leon, Special Correspondence, Aug. 28.—Much has been said and written about Mexican haciendas, but probably few people realize the vast extent and unlimited possibilities of some of them. In the Central and Northern States of Mexico are found estates large enough to hide our own "Little Rhody," or many a principality of Europe. A million and a half acres of this fruitful soil, which bears everything grown in both temperate and tropical zones, and produces two crops a year, is a neat little farm, by no means "to be despised," as the immortal Sairy said of "vittles." The famous Solado estate, for example, contains over 600 square miles. It lies partly in the States of Nuevo Leon, Coahuila, Zacatecas and San Luis Potosi, on the highway to the capital and on the line of the new Mexican Central railroad. It has an average elevation of 4,000 feet, on the far-famed central table lands of the republic. Its boundaries extend more than 100 miles from north to south; chains of mountains traverse it—how rich in mineral wealth nobody knows—and flourishing farms and mining villages are met at frequent intervals. The fact that all Mexico is owned by a comparatively few individuals is the chief reason for such wide distinction of caste—the impassable gulf that is fixed between rich and poor—and why so little progress has been made in agriculture and manufactures. Generally, the proprietor of these vast estates enjoys life abroad, or in the gay and fashionable capital; and his peons living on the land take about as much interest in the cultivation thereof as would negro slaves without an overseer. Beside great possessions are death to ambition. That is a wise clause in the Litany, "In all time of our prosperity, good Lord deliver us." The average New England farmer, whose few hilly acres yield nothing bountifully but stones and blackberry briars, and who acquires a chronic limp from constant "side-hill" labor, really produces more in his one crop a year than the proprietor of a thousand acres in this land of eternal sunshine. But then, climatic influences must be taken into account, as well as the difference in temperament between the happy-go-lucky Latin and the thrifty, industrious Anglo-Saxon race. As to the actual productiveness of this soil, it is difficult to get reliable information down to figures. If you inquire of a Mexican how much his field or orchard yields, the invariable reply—accompanied by a shrug of the shoulders worthy of a French dancing master—is "Quien sabe?" (Who knows), or "Asi Dios quiere," (as God wills!) I have ascertained that with Mexican cultivation—which means merely tickling the surface of the soil, and turning on water now and then—from twenty-five to forty bushels of corn are considered a satisfactory yield. The few who have tried our improved methods of cultivation affirm that they readily produce from fifty to seventy-five bushels to the acre, each crop, planting the first in February, and the second in July or August. The standard price of corn in Monterey is 2 cents per pound.

A FERTILE LAND.

The principal crops in this State are corn, barley, beans and sugar-cane—and they tell stories almost as tall as the corn about the marvelous growth of the latter. Riding along the watercourses, anywhere in the suburbs, one sees impenetrable thickets of giant wild cane, rivaling Jack's historic beanstalk in height. A gentleman who owns what he calls a "quinta pequino" (little garden) of 100 acres, near Monterey tells me he bought it, in 1882, for $22 per acre, and that the first year's yield of only ten acres of it in sugar-cane realized $700. Judge Golindo, a resident of this city, and one of the federal judges of Mexico, informs me that his sugar ranch was seeded twenty-three years ago. The cane has ripened year after year more than nine feet high, and there has never been any falling off in the yield. But there are drawbacks to this flattering picture. Irrigation, which is troublesome and and expensive at best, is essential here, and the trouble in this section seems to be that all the available water has already been transferred from the rivers to the irrigating ditches. The water question, which in Utah the Mormons have regulated to the nicety of clockwork, is here among the mysteries which "no fellow can find out." If you ask a famer as to his irrigation privileges, he will tell you he has "nine days' water," "thirteen days' water," "twenty days' water," as the case may be—which means that he has the privilege of turning water on his land once in nine, thirteen or twenty days—for which privilege you may be sure he pays a good round sum. It must be borne in mind that the rains of heaven, like many other things in this tropical clime—are not to be depended upon. They fall, according to promise, alike upon the just and the unjust, but at long and always unexpected intervals, and generally come in torrents that flood the fields and do far more damage than good. It is but reasonable logic to conclude that if this land is valuable only when irrigated, and if all the available water is already in use on lands now under cultivation, then the country must look to improved methods to increase its cultivated area; and as the natives have not advanced a single step in a hundred years in the way of agriculture, it clearly rests with some enterprising Yankee to devise the method. Artesian wells have not yet been tried (to my knowledge) for purposes of irrigation, but that water is plenty, though far below the surface, is proven by the numerous very deep wells of clear, pure water found all over Mexico. A Mexican's hovel may not be fit for cattle to live in, but it is certain to have a good well, which is as much a hobby with him as a fine barn is with a Pennsylvania farmer. The other day I visited Judge Golindo's sugar ranch, and viewed the whole process of piloncillo (sugar) making. The family carriage (an antique ark, guiltless of the modern frivolity of springs, with a square aperture high up in the air for a door,* through which ingress and egress necessitated an embarrassing display of hosiery) conveyed us to the spot, about five miles from Monterey.

COUNTRY SCENES.

I wish I could make you see the queer scenes en route. The great Saddle mountain—appearing close at hand, but in reality miles away overshadows us the entire distance on the right; and the bare, hot fields on the left are dotted with the cane-stalk huts—thatched with Spanish dagger leaves—of the Mexican poor. There are few large trees in this part of Mexico, and not many of any kind—outside the haciendas—but palm and Spanish dagger. The meadows bear no grass worth mentioning, but grow unlimited cactus and a variety of wild flowers. The roadsides are lined with a luxuriant growth of flowering bushes—planted for hedges—over which wild clematis climbs in great profusion, mixed with purple heliotrope and ageratum, mignonette, nasturtium and other floral favorites, which require careful cultivation in colder climates. There are no "fences" in Mexico, but vine-draped walls of gray adobe, upon which the "insidious tooth of time" makes but slight impression. Each little hut, which has only Mother Earth for a floor, and neither stove, bedstead, chair, nor table among its furnishings, is hedged with tall maguey (the aloe or "century" plant, of whose numerous uses I will tell you anon,) and set in the midst of roses and magnificent oleanders, white and red, in perpetual bloom. Generally a few broad-leaved bananas also shade its humble roof, and a fig tree spreads its leafy branches over all. The happy owner of this Home, Sweet Home, never dreams of such a thing as scratching up a little of the land lying unoccupied all around him, and planting therein a few cabbages and potatoes. Why should he trouble himself? Tortillas and frijoles (cakes made of pounded corn mixed with water and small red beans) suit him well enough for food, and for 5 cents he can buy enough to last his whole family for a day. If there are any unreasonable Oliver Twists in the household who call for more, why there is the never-failing fig tree and occasional bananas, and no end of garlic and Chili peppers growing wild in the hedges. If he is rich enough to own a goat, his wife makes a tiny cheese now and then—something like sweitzerkase, and not to be eaten until you can smell it a mile; and the greatest luxury he can imagine is curdled goat's milk mixed with his beans and garlic. What more could any well regulated Mexican desire? We meet a constant procession of donkeys on the road, each with a rider sitting almost upon its tail and carrying the cargo on a rude sort of saddle in front—where the rider would sit in any other country under the sun. Sometimes an entire family actually covers a diminutive donkey from "stem to stern," as it were. Anon great heaps of merchandise, packs of Mexican pottery, or crooked sticks from the mountains for burning bulge out upon either side and tower far above the head of the poor little beast. Behind us the quaint city, whose low adobe walls are lost to sight at a short distance, seems to sleep the sleep of ages. But the great yellow tower of the cathedral, which represents the overshadowing power in Mexico—that of the Roman Catholic church—are still a prominent feature in the landscape, and the everlasting hills stand guard on every hand. I have not seen a four-wheeled wagon, or omnibus, or iron plow in Mexico. The import duty is $10 per wheel. The plows are three-cornered wooden concerns, exactly like those used in ancient Egypt centuries ago, if pictures of the latter are correct. The carts are ponderous vehicles, each with two enormous wheels of solid wood and not a particle of iron about them, looking of themselves a sufficient load for any pair of animals. These carts are usually propelled by several lean oxen, driven four abreast, three abreast, tandem, hap-hazzard, and always with heavy wooden yokes tied by the horns upon their foreheads. Their heads are thus bowed nearly to the ground by the weight of wood upon them, and their eyes wear a look of suffering pitiable to behold, while the driver amuses himself by constantly prodding them with a long pole, in the end of which is a sharp iron spear. Oh! for a Bergh in Mexico is our daily cry. If the theory of transmigration of souls be true, may heaven preserve us from "a future state" in the form of oxen or donkeys.

SUGAR AND FRUIT.

The sugar factory aforesaid is a rustic mill standing in the open field, worked by one decrepit mule, and "tended" by a solitary Mexican—the only human being beside ourselves in sight. Judge Golindo's methods and machinery are primitive as compared to commodious manufactories in the United States; but perhaps he is wiser, as expenses are less and his gains correspondingly greater. The cane stalks serve a double purpose, for, after having been squeezed dry in the well, they are thrust into the furnace for fuel. The sap runs by a rude trough from the mill into a tin vat, under which is the mud oven dignified by the name of furnace. When sufficiently boiled, the syrup is cooled and molded in tiny earthen pots, exactly like our smallest plant-jars, only a trifle deeper. Each little cake is then separately wrapped in dried leaves of the cane, and is ready for shipping. The skimmings of the boiling sap are utilized in making a popular beverage resembling cider, called aqua miel (honey water) or miel de cana. The piloncillo syrup is by no means as pleasant to the taste as our maple, but it is more like Chinese sorghum.

In this part of Mexico, as well as farther southward, the orange tree grows luxuriantly. In Texas, where great quantities of the fruit are shipped, Mexican oranges are considered superior to those from any other point. Figs are as plentiful as the blackberry briers before mentioned, in country lanes of New England, and so cheap that few consider them worth picking to sell. An establishment for drying, packing and shipping them could not fail to realize handsome returns. The principal exports from Monterey are silver and lead from the mines, hides, goat skins and a textile fiber called in Aztic dialect which is extensively used in the United States in the manufacture of ropes. An endless quantity of this valuable fiber could be obtained if machines were invented to separate it from the pulp. From time immemorial this has been done in a slow and tedious manner by separating it, leaf by leaf, with a knife. The price of ixtle in Monterey is $1.25 per arroba or twenty-five pounds. In the neighboring State—Coahuila—great quantities of grapes are grown, both white and purple. In Parras much wine is made, of a superior quality—a sort of cross between port and claret, and another variety which tastes much like sherry. When rail facilities are fairly established, no doubt this also will form an important item of export—not to mention the many strange tropical fruits with which inquisitive Americans would like to become acquainted. Pomegranates grow to great size here, also ahuacates, like those of Cuba, which are considered such a luxury that they sell for $2 apiece in New York. Even the despised cactus, like adversity, is not without its uses. Indeed, I don't know what the country would do without it. In the long, dry summers, when water is scarce, countless flocks of sheep and goats are kept alive by splitting the broad, flat leaves of the prickly pear variety and allowing the creatures to suck the natural moisture contained inside. The favorite diet of American donkeys is said to be tin cans and thistles, but their Mexican cousins fare better, on toasted cactus, which their owners prepare by holding branches of it on a stick (it is impossible to handle otherwise) over a slow fire till the thorns are burned off. Each variety of cactus bears its fruit, all "good for man and beast," and more or less palatable—whether pale green, blood red or black when ripe.

Of late the mines of this section have been attracting almost as much attention as the more celebrated ones of Sonora and other portions of Mexico. Several companies of American capitalists have recently been organized, and are now working at Villedama, Salinas, Victoria and other points in the immediate vicinity of Monterey. Though the memory of man goeth not to a time when these mines have not been worked—Mexican fashion—it is expected that now, with improved machinery and Yankee enterprise, their yield will be greatly improved. When we recall accounts of the enormous stores of gold and silver possessed by the early Aztecs, Tlascians and Tezcucans, in the morning twilight of Mexican history—in the days of Montezuma, Ixtlazihuatl, Nezahualpitli, Ixtolxochitl, and other ancient worthies with jaw-breaking names—we wonder if there was no bottom created to these mines, or if nature is busier here than elsewhere.

CHANCES FOR ENTERPRISE.

Near Monterey are three factories, run by water power, for the manufacture of cotton cloth. Two of them make bleached goods, and have been so successful that they have doubled the number of looms within the last year. The cheapest calico, which in St. Paul retails for 4 cents a yard, here sells for 25 or 30 cents per vara, which is about three-quarters of a yard. As the duty on prints amounts to more than the cost of the cloth itself, it would well repay capitalists to establish print factories in this section, especially as the duty on raw cotton is simply nominal, and the price of labor less here than anywhere else on the continent. Of course, the importance of these factories will increase with the opening of facilities to reach other portions of Mexico. Formerly all goods had to be transported in carts or on pack mules, but the railroads will soon do away with such slow transit. Machinery of all kinds goes free of duty, and right here is an idea for enterprising agents, viz: The most cheaply gotten up sewing machines sell readily in Mexico for $125 and upward. A paper mill erected near Monterey would be a fortune for somebody. Paper costs $2 per ream in the United States, but by the time it has crossed the border and paid the duties, has advanced to $5.50 per ream. The refuse of the cotton mills, which is burned as of no value, could no doubt be utilized in this new industry. A soap factory, also, ought to yield a bonanza here. We pay 50 cents in Mexico for cakes of ordinary toilet soap, which sell elsewhere for 10 cents, and from $1 to $1.50 for "Lubin's best." Common brown bar soap is sold in thin slices—resembling boarding school sponge cake—for a madio (6 cents) a slice, or 35 cents per bar. As may be inferred, the Mexican poor seldom indulge in such an expensive luxury as soap, but use instead amole, the root of the mountain shrub Lechuguilla, which answers the purpose as well, except that it roughens the skin like a cactus leaf. One would think that soap-making materials might be readily obtained in a land where wood only is used for fuel and much fat for food—except for the fact that the national appetite for the latter leads to the consumption of all those portions of pork, etc., which we consider fit only for soap grease. In my opinion another fortune lies in potato raising and market gardening. During six months' residence in Mexico I have scarcely seen an Irish potato. Although they grow readily in this soil, nobody seems to have thought of planting them—simply because it is not "the custom." They are imported from the States, and sold at exorbitant prices, by the piece or pound—for you would be as likely to buy calico by the quart as anything by the peck or bushel in Mexico. Many strawberries are grown in Coahuila; but as they are not readily transported long distances, over mountain roads on mule-back—except in the form of "jam"—they are never seen in this market. Neither are such small fruits as cherries, raspberries, plums—or asparagus, etc.—though fruits and vegetables of all kinds grow easily in this climate and would find a ready sale.

WHO OWNS THE LANDS.

The treasury department of Mexico has recently published an official valuation of the "landed property" in the republic, and puts its total valuation at upward of $3,000,000,000. Of this nearly two-thirds is credited to "urban estates," and the remainder (exclusive of church property) to estates pertaining to the government. Among the "urban" details are enumerated forty-six theaters, valued at $5,600,000; twenty-three Plazas de Torros (for the popular Sunday amusement of bull-fighting), valued at $640,000; and ninety-eight "cock pits" (for the equally popular diversion of cock fighting, at $116,000. The church buildings are divided into two classes, 178 large edifices (all Roman Catholic) valued at $54,000,000; and 1,200 lesser edifices—including the very few places for Protestant worship—at $27,000,000. The city houses are divided into three classes, numbering, all told, 1,421,038 at a total valuation of $1,813,700,000. This includes places of business as well as residence; but it is seldom in Mexico that a business exists independent of a dwelling. The extremes of wealth and poverty, palace and hovel, are clearly set forth in this official statement, by comparing its estimates of urban estate of the "first" class with those of the "third" class. The former, numbering only 36,648, are valued at $897,000,000, while the latter, which number 1,186,440, are valued at $367,000,000. This makes an average value of $24,500 for those of the first class, and only $300 for those of the third. Considering that the entire population of the republic does not exceed 12,000,000 at the most extaavagant estimates, this number of urban houses in proportion to population is very large. It bears witness to a distinctive characteristic of Mexico—the crowding of the people into cities by reason of the former insecurity of country life. In all Mexico there is not a farm house, as we understand the term. The haciendas are really behind whose high adobe walls the owners were forced, in times not long past, to shelter their laborers, horses and cattle from depredators, like the barons of old. So great has been the insecurity that even the largest cities have no "suburbs," no fine residence fringing the outskirts, as in every other country. But all this is bound to be changed, now that the "new epoch" has fairly begun. There is much alleged improvement which does not improve, and when Mexico shall have become thoroughly Americanized—as will surely be the case within the next decade—her chief charm and interest will have departed with her olden dangers, among the shadowy "things that were." If you desire to see the land of the cactus and the palm, with the glimmer of the Past upon her, you must come quickly, for the Prince—whose name is Young America—is already on the way to awaken the Sleeping Beauty from the repose of centuries.

FANNIE BRIGHAM WARD.

THAT $25,000 CHECK

Which was Paid Over to Editor Dana in the 1880 Campaign—Chapter of Evidence from a Democratic Source.

New York Star: Midsummer politics have been enlived more than usual this season, on account of the controversy which has been raised by the charges of Judge Daniel C. Birdsall of Westport, Conn., against Editor Dana of the New York Sun, accusing the latter of turning traitor to Gen. Hancock in the last presidential campaign. Judge Birdsall's charges were first published in the Hartford Courant a few weeks ago, since which the Sun has persistently avoided a direct answer to the accusations. It was alleged over a year ago that, just previous to the publication in the Sun of the notorious "250-pound" editorial abusing Gen. Hancock, a check for $25,000 passed through the Third National bank of this city, drawn by Mr. Tilden to the order of Mr. Dana. This has never been denied by the latter. A prominent city official, who is conversant with all the facts in the case, was yesterday asked if it were not true that Mr. Tilden paid Dana $25,000 in 1880, shortly before the Sun turned against Gen. Hancock.

"I know the money was paid," he replied, without hesitation.

"In what form was the payment made?"

"By a check, which was presented and cashed at the Third National bank of this city. The check was signed by Mr. Tilden and made payable to Mr. Dana, or order. It was dated one or two days before the Sun turned against Gen. Hancock."

"Did you see the check?"

"I did not see it, but the officer at the Third National bank, through whose hands it passed, told me all about it."

"And you place implicit confidence in his statement?"

"I do; and I am just as certain of the existence of the check as if I had seen it with my own eyes. My informant is a thoroughly reliable man—one who would scorn to fabricate a story of this kind."

"What is his name?"

"That I must refuse to disclose at present. In the first place, if I were to give his name it would be likely involve him in trouble with the bank, and perhaps be the means of his losing his position; and, secondly, it would be a breach of confidence on my part, for I promised to keep his name a secret."

"Who called at the bank with the check and got the money?"

"One of Mr. Dana's representatives, who could collect the cash, as the check was made payable to order."

The name of the Star's informant it is not necessary to give at present. Should his statement be called in question he will be ready to publicly vouch for its authenticity. His public position is such as to give his assertions additional weight. At any rate his statement, based upon the testimony given by the bank officer, is cumulative evidence, which leaves no room for doubt as to the real facts in the case.

The French Newspaper Press.

Cornhill Magazine: All the Paris journals publish more or less faits divers, but some half-dozen of them keep one or two "reporters a l'Americaine," with a staff of subalterns under them. The "reporter a l'Americaine" has a specialty of interviewing the celebrity of the hour, of wresting secrets from diplomatists and statesmen, and of bribing the valets of kings en voyage to tell him what the monarchs eat for breakfast. The "reporter a l'Americaine" doubtless arrives at a certain number of interesting facts, but his prose is utterly untrustworthy and too full of his own personality to be practical. The whole system of reporting and news gathering is trivial. There is not a single Parisian journal that gives an adequate and thoroughly unbiased report of a political meeting. As for rapidity in publishing news, it is out of the question. A catastrophe happens at Lyons, say on Monday morning, the Havas telegraphic agency receives a dispatch of ten lines, Figaro sends down its "reporter a l'Americaine" and in the Figaro of Tuesday we read "Terrible catastrophe at Lyons. By telegraph. I arrived here to find the whole city in desolation. The latest reports mention twenty killed and 300 wounded. Full details to-morrow. Pierre Giffard."

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

The reports that have been extensively circulated, of the damage to crops in the northwest have been greatly exaggerated.

A couple of Mormon elders, who have been preaching in the neighborhood of Laurel, Indiana, were treated to a coat of tar and feathers a few nights ago. It appears they had converted a young girl, baptized her and then secreted her away from home, probably intending to send her to Utah.

The commission appointed to visit the Sandwich Islands for the purpose of investigating the charges of fraud in the sugar traffic, which were made to the last congress by Perry Belmont, has recently made its report to Secretary Folger. The allegations of fraud are found unwarranted by the facts.

It is claimed that at the trial of O'Donnell for the murder of James Carey, the Irish informer, which will be held in England in November, the prosecution will introduce American detectives to give evidence that they have discovered a connection between O'Donnell and certain American secret societies.

A clause in the constitution of Belgium adopted in the year 1830, declares not only that the censorship shall be abolished but that it can "never be reestablished," thus making it the only country in Europe which, like the United States of America, is absolutely without a censorship. Books and plays which could not pass the censorship in France may be brought out in Belgium, and a comedy by M. Delair now about to be produced in Brussels had been condemned and rejected by the theatrical censorship of Paris.

Some comparison between the railroad management in Europe, and that of the United States are favorable to the way we do business in this country. In the United States, during the past year, 289,190,783 persons were transported on 107,000 miles of railway, or six times the total population of the country. The total number of persons killed on the roads was something over 4,000. In Europe, in 1881, scarcely 170,000,000 passengers were transported over 172,804 miles of railway. The European railways, in the year 1881, killed 6,500 persons.

Burlington, Vt., has a striking instance of a man whose conscience troubles him for a deed which was decided by the courts to be meritorious. Twenty years ago William Faulkner, under great provocation, shot and killed a ruffian, for which he was promptly acquitted on the plea of justifiable homicide. Nevertheless, he has found it impossible to sleep for the past twenty years after 3 o'clock in the morning. Remorse seizes him at that hour, and for several hours after he is driven out of his house as there is no other place open at that time of night he has made it a practice for twenty years past to go to the press-room of a daily paper, where he is always looked for exactly at 3:15 a. m.

The Commissioner of Patents has submitted the report of the business of the Patent Office for the fiscal year ended June 30. The report shows the number of applications for patents was 32,845; number for design patents received, 1,089; number of applications for the registration of trade marks, 854; number of applications for the registration of labels, 749; total 35,724 as against 30,062 in 1883. Number of caveats filed, 2,988; number of patents granted, including reissues and designs, 21,185; number of trade marks registered, 883; number of labels registered, 918; total, 22,686. Number of Patents witheld for nonpayments of final fees 2,056; number of patents withheld for nonpayments of final fees 2,056; number of patents expired, 7,471; receipts from all sources, $1,095,844; expenditures, not including printing; $577,628; surplus, $548,245; increase in receipts over 1881, $305,989,; over 1882, $165,020. Number of applications awaiting action on the part of the office July 1, 1883, 4,690: increase, 39 per cent. over 1882. The Commissioner says the business of the office is steadily and rapidly increasing, and that nearly $2.500 000 now stand to the credit of the office in the Treasury.

The failure to relieve the Greeley Arctic expedition forces one to the painful conclusion that the daring men who compose it will meet the fate which so many others have met who have volunteered to seek the North Pole. The Greeley expedition has reached a point farther North than have any of its predecessors, but this fact tends only to make its destruction more certain. While one can but admire the daring spirit which animates the men who volunteer in these more than hazardous undertakings, the repeated disasters and the repeated loss of the lives of so many valuable men lead one to inquire if it is not about time to cease sending these expeditions to the Arctic Ocean. What has thus far been acomplished for science that will warrant the loss of a single ship's crew? suppose it is demonstrated that there is an open sea about he North Pole—what use will that knowledge be to any human being? Who has been benefited by this loss of life and property in the past? Is there any likelihood that anybody will be benefited should the North Pole be reached by more fortunate adventurers than have yet lost their lives in these fruitless undertakings? These are some of the questions which people ask when the failure and loss of another expedition is announced.

The Chinese Must Stay Out.

Mr. James, chief of the customs division of the treasury department, on being asked whether a request had been made by the Chinese consul at New York] for permission to land certain Chinese sailors recently brought to that port. He said that the matter had not been brought to the notice of the department officially, but he had received a telegram from New York asking if a decision had been reached in the case in question. He had replied that the question had been decided by Judge Potter in New York last August, the latter holding in the case of J. Fork, a Chinese sailor on a British steamship, that the Chinese sailors were placed by law on the same footing as other Chinese laborers, and could not be landed. Mr. James said a similar decision had been reached at San Francisco last year. He said also that the treasury department could not construe the law, that being a matter for the courts. He thought that Judge Potter's decision was all that was necessary in this particular case.

Fatal Disaster at Pittsburg, Pa.

Another disaster has been added to the list of accidents that has from time to time spread consternation and grief among the iron and steel workers of Pittsburg, Pa., and their families, resulting in the instant death of three men and serious and probably fatal injury of twelve others. On the afternoon of Sept. 20th a shock was felt throughout the city which shook many buildings to their foundations, smashed windows and terribly frightened the residents of the south side, who rushed from their houses into the street in terror. Immediately after the shock an alarm of fire struck, and upon investigation, it was found that a large boiler in the flanging department of the Sligo Iron works had exploded with fearful violence, scattering flying fragments in every direction, setting fire to the Lake Erie railroad shops and a number of dwellings in the vicinity. The news of the disaster spread rapidly, and soon thousands of people were on the scene of destruction. Upon arrival there a fearful sight met their gaze. The boiler department, a brick structure, was a complete wreck, as was a number of passenger and freight cars, and the master mechanics' shops of the Lake Erie railroad, while a row of dwellings on the opposite side of the street was in flames. Men, women and children were running about wringing their hands and calling for friends who they supposed were either killed or wounded in the ruins of the flanging department. Scattered around were dead and dying, some with arms and legs off; some disfigured beyond recognition, and others suffering from painful burns and scalds. It was found that at the time of the explosion twenty men were at work. Of these nine are reported all right; three were killed and eight badly injured, four fatally, while four children of Charles Douglass, who lived across the way, were also badly hurt.

John W. Allen, top of head blown off. Charles Douglass, side of head blown off. Jessie Douglass, little girl, fatally scalded. Louis House, leg and arm broken and otherwise fatally injured. John McGarrigan, scalded and sides crushed in. The injured are: William Stewart, both legs broken, injuries fatal. William Rodeman, compound fracture of right leg and other injuries; probably fatal. Thomas Smith, hand blown off and other injuries, probably fatal. Christ Miller, fatally scalded. Edward Molley, head hurt by falling debris. Patrick Leek, leg and arm blown off; serious. Patrick Welch, shoulder blade fractured. John Douglass, boy, scalded, serious. Willie Douglass, injured about head. Baby Douglass, scalded with steam; very serious.

The works were owned by Phillips, Merrick & Co. Their loss is estimated at $10,000. The loss to the Lake Erie railroad company and dwellings is about $3,000.

The Steglitz Horror.

Berlin Special: Steglitz is a favorite place of resort for Berliners, and lies on the Potsdam & Magdeburg railway, three miles to the southwest. The accident, which may be called a massacre, stands probably unique in the annals of railway disasters. Yesterday, being both Sunday and the Sedan anniversary, the place was crowded with excursionists to the Schuetzenfest and other festivities in honor of the day. By 10 o'clock yesterday evening a crowd of 500 persons filled the platform of the railway station waiting for the return train. When the latter arrived after some delay on the up line the barriers still remained closed to await the passing of the Cologne night express, which leaves Berlin at 9:50 p. m. Suddenly, however, the pressure of the impatient crowd forced the barriers aside, and, despite the efforts of the railway officials, hundreds rushed across the down line to enter the cars. At that very moment the express came tearing along, and, although the driver on seeing the danger-signals displayed at the last moment applied the brakes, the train dashed right through the mass of people covering the line, and annihilated everything in its way. One terrible cry of anguish arose even above the thunder of the train, and all was over. The details of this terrible scene, lasting only a few seconds, as narrated by eye-witnesses, are almost too harrowing for repetition. Forty persons, of whom seventeen were men, eighteen women, and five children, were instantly killed, and about twenty-five wounded. All the victims belong to the artisan and laboring classes. For a distance of 100 yards the line was covered with bodies, all shockingly mutilated, and human fragments. Of one family of five persons only one boy escaped. The killed include four married couples, five members of the Shooters' company, with the flag-bearers and three artillery corporals. One of the latter had both legs and his heavy sabre cut through as with a knife. One girl had nearly reached the local train when the draught caused by the express threw her under the locomotive. One woman had both legs cut off, and on being carried to the waiting room gave birth to a dead child and expired. Another woman and a sailor in the imperial navy were completely decapitated, and no vestige of the heads have been found. A child had one hand cut off, and one body was entirely divested of clothing. The driver of the express train had to be relieved, being unable to proceed after witnessing the scene of carnage. His locomotive was covered with pieces of flesh, bones, rags, and drenched with blood. The line remained blocked for hours, while detachments of firemen and soldiers gathered the remains of the victims by torchlight.

Operations of the Omaha System.

The Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway company has rendered its annual report for the year ending June 30, 1883, to the railroad commissioner. This shows that the company has in operation, of all kinds of track, in Wisconsin, 472 miles; in Nebraska, 199 miles; in Iowa, 92 miles; in Minnesota, 418 miles, and in Dakota, 58 miles, making a total of 1,240 miles. The total number of passengers carried on the whole line was 872,878, and the total tons of freight carried one mile, 282,206,291. The total earnings from the passenger department were, in Wisconsin, $771,365, and on the whole line, $1,512,654, while the total earnings from the freight department were, in Wisconsin, $1,606,754, and on the whole line, $3,572,919, making the grand total of exportation earnings $2,378.119 in Wisconsin, and $5,085,573 on the whole line. Washington News Notes.

Secretary Folger has sent a communication to the collector of customs at New York, stating that the United States cattle commission had been informed of an alarming increase in the foot and mouth disease among the cattle of Great Britain. Under these circumstances officers of the customs service would hereafter exercise care in examining into the sanitary condition of all cattle, sheep and swine imported into the United States. Should any of the animals mentioned be found suffering with disease, the owners should be promptly notified of the danger and requested to allow the detention and quarantine of the cattle. This subject has been carefully investigated, and the increase of the disease has at last been admitted by the press of Great Britain, which is unanimous in urging steps for its extermination.

At this the burglar ran, pursued by the clerk. Watchman Kelly hearing the noise of the firing ran at once to see what it was, and arrived in time to see the thief running from the building. Drawing his revolver and firing it in the air he ordered the thief to stop, which only produced the opposite result. Foreign News Gossip.

The London Times, in tracing the antecedents of O'Donnell, the slayer of Carey, finds that he is forty-five years of age, and a native of Meracluddy, County Donegal, Ireland. He has been to America several times, served in the American war, lived for some time in Philadelphia, and kept a public house on the Canadian border. He invested his funds in silver mines and Fenian bonds, and lost his money. He returned to Ireland last May and frequented the company of Irish Americans in Londonderry. He carried a revolver, and was considered a strong nationalist, but was opposed to Invincibles. He denounced Carey when the latter turned informer, and declared he would not shoot, but would burn him by inches. He went to the Cape to seek work, because he considered America played out. He had never seen Carey before taking passage and had no idea the informer was on board the steamer when he embarked. The defense will probably be that Cary tried to shoot the prisoner, who wrenched the revolver away and used it to protect his own life. It is stated that O'Donnell's brother, who is living in Ireland, will endeavor to obtain the services of A. M. Sullivan, M. P., to conduct the defense. An Orange Wrapping in Florida.

Florida Letter in Atlanta Constitution.

Last night our party of tourists went to an "orange wrapping." A large warehouse belonging to the Wilkinson place was lighted up with candles placed along the walls and all the "help" of the neighborhood was gathered. In one corner of the room there were huge boxes filled with oranges. They were rigged with handles at each end, and it took two men to bring one of them in. On the opposite side of the room were long tables, behind which sat the "wrappers." The fruit was supplied to them by boys, who carried it in bread-trays, putting a tray to every three men. Before each man was a package of tissue paper. By a dexterous movement an orange was enveloped in a leaf of paper by one motion. As the fruit was wrapped it was dropped into another tray, which was carried to the "packers," who stood before a pile of empty crates. Each orange was placed in the crate separately, being packed in close rows. A crate holds from 120 to 140 oranges, and sells here for about $3. The oranges are not brought direct from the grove to the packing-house, but rest a day or two in the drying house. There they are spread over lattice shelves, where they go through a "sweating" process before they are ready for shipment. The scene in the wrapping house was a pretty one. The golden fruit piled in rich profusion, the men and boys laughing as they handled it so rapidly, the orderly crates with their tempting contents, a heap of pineapples in an odd corner filling the room with their exquisite flavor, huge bunches of bananas with just a fleck of yellow here and there amid the green, clean-looking lemons almost as large as the oranges heaped off to themselves, great citrons with their royal gold color, groups of boatmen and hunters with their swarthy faces and picturesque attire lending a hand wherever it was needed, a negro with a banjo strumming rude tunes to which the crowd gave casual accompaniment, the ladies watching curiously and sampling an orange now and then—these were some of the elements that made up the scene, the whole being enlivened with the haste and bustle of getting ready against the next day's boat and having the boat ready to go out with the ship.

Edwin Booth and Wife.

New York Letter.

The physicians have notified Mr. Booth to be ready at any moment to receive the announcement of Mrs. Booth's death. The parents of Mrs. Booth were told how near the end the sufferer appeared to be, and advised that she should see her husband. To this they immediately acceded, but their daughter hedged about an interview with so many conditions that Mr. Booth has not as yet availed himself of the permission given. She is entirely conscious of her condition, even knowing that the report of her death was common last Sunday. She has received several friends and given away many keepsakes to them. Mr. Booth is extremely solicitous and nervous. The writer of this letter happens to know by personal observation how good a husband he was. There never was a wife less crushed and more completely master of the situation than little Mrs. Booth—a statement in which half the theatrical profession will bear me out. It is very unfortunate that this domestic complication should have occurred, but it is very wicked to add to Mr. Booth's troubles and sorrows by accusations wholly false.

"Now, John," said the father of the city family to the father of the country family, "we have been spending all summer with you, and as some sort of recompense we are going to have some amateur theatricals and give you a farewell benefit." "No, thanks to you Charles," was the reply; "don't wait to do that. The farewell will be benefit enough for me."

Beltrami Happenings.

BELTRAMI, Sept. 24th, 1883.

I thought "JIMMY" and "TELEPHONE" had forgotten you and I would favor you with a communication.

We are having lovely fall weather and the farmers are very busy threshing and disposing of their grain.

D. T. Herlott and Geo. Reis have been threshing for the past two weeks and their grain has yielded between 15 and 20 bushels to the acre. They feel encouraged, and think they will try farming another year in the Northwest

Our school opens on Monday, to be taught by a lady from Grand Forks.

As Henry Budd was driving by Mr. Erikson's fence he spied an animal which he took to be a cow but when he saw it climbing a tree he concluded it was a bear. He went for Mr. Stambaugh who was just getting ready to go on a hunting expedition. After shooting four times they brought bruin down.

Mrs. J. B. Donell, and children, of Bradford, Pa, Mr. and Mrs. Dorran, of Andover, Mass, and Mrs. Ed. Ingrahm and children, of Greenville, Pa., the guests of Mr. Joseph Murphy and D. T. Heriott, have returned to their eastern homes, they were pleased with this western country.

Miss Minnie Murphy who has been spending her vacation at home will return to her school at Maple Lake this week.

We met a young man on the prairie in a wagon with a box in it and he was driving so careful that we were anxious to know the contents of the box, and looking in found it contained only eight cats.

Mr. O. W. Kimberly moves to the farm to-day; he expects to remain there as he has sold his house in town to Mrs. Richardson, who takes possession this week.

Mrs. Smith and grand-daughter, Miss Smith, arrived last Thursday. They will spend the winter here.

BETH.

Detroit Record: Wm. Norcross, our efficient city marshal, with a companion, armed himself last Wednesday and started after the festive duck. Some four miles from town while "on the tramp" his horse became tired of waiting and leisurely walked homeward leaving the buggy and the boys to shift for themselves. They were obliged to take shank's horses and leave their buggy, game and fish behind.

THE TIDE OF IMMIGRATION.

Belief that a Larger Number of Europeans Will Settle in the Northwest Next Year than Ever Before.

Milwaukee, Sept., 22.—Hon C. F. J. Moller has just returned from Europe, having been commissioned by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway company to obtain date bearing on the probabilities of immigration to the northwest during the coming year. He has made careful inquiry in England and on the continent and reports that every indication points to a larger immigration from Scandinavian countries and from Germany than ever before in a single year, and the great mass of those coming intend to settle in Dakota, Minnesota, and other parts of the northwest. Already the ocean steamship companies are preparing to increase their facilities for bringing immigrants, their object being to secure the largest possible advantage from the movement. The southern portion of Dakota especially will be the objective point of many of the immigrants.

Preparing for Early Frost in the Garden.

The season during which garden vegetables may be enjoyed can be prolonged at both ends. Many are ready to do this by forwarding their various vegetables under frames in spring, who neglect to provide for the fall supply. It is well to plan at once for the other end of the season, especially in northern localities, where an early frost may play havoc with the tender plants in the garden. Those who keep the run of the weather are aware that, in northern localities, at least, there are usually two or three nights of early frost, followed by a period of glorious weather, in which all the plants that have escaped the first attacks, seem to luxuriate in the growing period which follows. In northern localities tomatoes are caught by the early frosts, just as they show the best prospect for fruit. Melons have set with excellent promise of ripening, which a single frost will blast, and the best of all beans, the Limas, will be checked just when they are apparently most productive, by the same adverse influence. If we can get safely over these early frosts, the season of productiveness can be greatly prolonged. With tomatoes, if there were no other advantage, the ability to shield them from early frosts is greatly in favor of training them to a trellis of some kind. Whatever will keep the vines from the ground, and in a compact form, will greatly increase the supply of fruit, and will allow of their being sheltered from the first frosts. In protecting from frost we have not, as many suppose, to ward off an attack of cold; we have only to keep the plants themselves from cooling to an undue extent. The least possible shelter will answer this purpose, and for garden uses, the most available is newspapers, without regard to their politics. If on nights when frost is apprehended newspapers are spread over the tomato plants, all the more conveniently done if they are trained to trellises, or over choice melons that have not yet ripened, as a rule the crop will be saved. The papers should be kept as far above the plants as possible. In protecting melons, it is well to place stakes a foot or more high among the vines, and allow the papers to rest upon the ends of these. It will not be very difficult to shield such low plants as tomatoes and melons. The first frost will kill Lima beans, if unprotected, and it will be well to take up the poles, digging the vines at the same time, when sure of an approaching frost, and place them under a shed. Treated in this manner, many of the young pods will fill and be available.

Heroes and Heroines of the Border.

In American history there are no more interesting figures than the Heroes and Heroines of the Border. Bold, dashing, adventurous and patriotic; loyal to friends, to country and to the interests of society, their work was singularly effective in the advancement of American civilization. With seeming recklessness, their efforts were in the interest of law and order, and the people owe them a debt of gratitude they do not forget. Their page in history is as fascinating as it is honorable, and there is a peculiar pleasure in reading the narrative of their wonderful exploits.

The times which produced those heroes and heroines mark a period in American history of absorbing interest alike to old and young. It is proper that it should be so. These hardy pioneers coupled virtue with courage, humanity and love of country with the stern duties of frontier life and battle, and the example of their lives not only interests but strengthens our faith and admiration in human courage and unselfish purpose.

In American pioneer history there are three distinct eras marked as distinctly by three geographical divisions; from the Allegheny Mountains to the Mississippi, making the first; from the Mississippi to the Rocky Mountains the second; California and the Pacific Slope the third. The settlement of these vast regions developed great leaders, whose achievements have made them justly and widely famous. They have a warm place in the hearts of the people, and a prominent one in their admiration. It is appropriate that their achievements should be recorded, and we note with pleasure the forthcoming of a new book, now ready, from the press of N. D. Thompson & Co., Publishers, New York and St. Louis, Mo., called: Conquering the Wilderness, or New Pictorial History of the Life and Times of The Pioneer Heroes and Heroines of America.

It is written by Col. Frank Triplett, an accomplished writer, whose literary qualifications and great experience on the frontiers are said to eminently fit him for so noble a task.

A special feature of the book is its apt and profuse illustration, embracing 220 superb engravings, illustrating incidents and persons—the latter embracing nearly 100 life-like portraits, of pioneer leaders, never before given—men and women—which make it a sort of picture gallery, as well as a book of thrilling narrative, that will lend to the book a charm and interest not to be resisted.

It is sold by subscription, through canvassing agents, and presents an opportunity to agents to make money especially inviting. We advertise it in another column.

Andrews' Bazar for October, just received, is a striking example of what push and a knowledge of the people's needs will do. This number is the third published under the new management and shows a great improvement over previous issues. The illustration on the first page is equal to any published in the highest priced paper of its class. The ladies of America will always be well dressed if they take this sterling fashion journal as a guide. Its low subscription price, only $1.00 a year, is bound to make it popular. Every subscriber is entitled to a choice from a list of valuable premiums, 67 in number. Sample copies 10c. Send for it.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON. THURSDAY. SEPT. 27.

Sheriff Burkhardt of Wabasha has been in the city for several days visiting with his son and grandson.

Mrs. Thos Harris has gone for a few weeks visit to Wabasha, Minn., Meanwhile Tom has to get along as best he can.

We were informed last week and so stated that the vote to retain Rev. C. E. Page was "nearly unanimous." That gentleman informs us that there was not one dissenting vote.

Hugh Robertson, accompanied by his bride has returned to the city. Hugh's many friends are pleased to meet him and extend the hand of congratulation. May he live long and prosper.

E. K. Overland was in from Garfield last week. While he was here it was discovered that he is the happy father of a new boy who arrived to grow up with the country on Aug. 23d. E. K. proceeded to distribute cigars among his many friends who crowded around to congratulate him.

The Pillsbury & Hurlbut elevator, at Angus, took fire early on Friday morning and was burned to the ground. It is said to have contained 5000 bushels of wheat. This leaves only one elevator at Angus, that of Sterrett, Hill & Childs which will doubtless have all it can do this fall.

Notice.

I desire to inform the public that although the firm of Haseltine Bros., has dissolved, I shall continue the nursery business on the old grounds, in Crookston, Minn. That E. W. Hasseltine who has been one of the firm has his share of nursery stock growing on my grounds in Crookston which he is selling out, but has no nursery as he has stated in his advertisement. All orders sent to my address will be promptly filled. Correspondence solicited.

Most Respectfully,

[20-tf] F. T. HASELTINE.

N. B.

To all whom it may concern:

The old Nursery is on Mrs. Devis' ground instead of F. T. Haseltine's as above stated, and I am paying rent for the use and growth of my share of Nursery stocks upon said grounds, from this date until I am requested to remove my stock from her grounds next year to another plot for a Nursery. I will sell to all parties coming here for trees and shrubs at a much reduced rate. Residence one block north of court house. Correspondence solicited.

Very respectfully,

[21-tf] E. W. HASELTINE.

County News.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Bjoin's mail coach was so crowded with passengers last Friday that he had to "run an extra train," or hack, to accommodate his passengers.

We are glad to notice, as an evidence of good times among our farmers, the extent to which they are investing in lumber and other building material, to improve their dwellings and stables.

We have never seen finer potatoes than those now being brought to market. Not a single potato that we have looked at is in anyway diseased, and the whole crop is unusually large and even sized.

From the Gazette.

Mr. H. Garvis met with a very painful accident last Friday while trying to stop his runaway team. Mr. G. seized the harness tug as the team ran past him, thinking he could catch the rein also, but the team sprang too quickly and dislocated his shoulder. It is hoped the accident will not prove serious and that the patient will soon recover.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Judge E. St. Julien Cox, of Grand Forks is in this vicinity indulging in the manly sport of slaughtering ducks, geese and chickens.

Capt. J. K. Arnold, formerly connected with the Northern Tier, is in these parts rusticating and recruiting preparatory to again embarking upon the stormy sea of Red River Valley journalism.

Mr. Hans Nelson has purchased this season nearly three thousand dollars worth of snake root from the Indians. What on earth is done with all this root, is to us, a mystery as yet unsolved.

Kikinawasakonk, the Indian who was shot on the reservation, was in town Saturday, in all the glory of his war paint, under which the scars on his face were invisible. He has still four shots in his head, but does not seem to suffer much.

Considerable excitement was occasioned among the passengers of the train which arrived here on Saturday last, by seeing a large black bear which came out of the brush just below the St. Hilaire hotel, and boldly followed the train almost up to the depot. Messrs. Judge Ives, T. Thibeault and several others started in pursuit and succeeded in wounding it several times but owing to the darkness were obliged to return without killing it. It was seen the next day about eight miles south of town with its leg broken.

Hiram M. Pierce, of Crookston, accompanied by his brother and a Mr. Brown, arrived in town yesterday, on their way to Mud Lake. They have a full camping outfit, provisions enough to last ten days, and about 500 shells apiece, loaded for both large and small game. Mr. E. A. Ranson, of this place accompanied them, and there is no doubt but they will bring back a large quantity of game. Mud Lake is the sportsman's paradise, and they are just commencing to find it out.

A serious accident occured yesterday upon the farm of Mr. Ulstein about two miles north of town. Mr. Ulstein was mowing hay with a mowing machine, when a bolt dropped out of some part of the machine, and he called his wife to assist him in finding it. Mrs. Ulstein after looking for some time without success, got in front of the knives to continue the search. At that instant the oxen started and before she could get out of the way the knives came in contact with her legs, below her knees tearing the flesh in a frightful manner and partly severing the bone. Dr. Walch attended the case and hopes to bring her through without amputating the limbs.

Cometary Phenomena.

On Monday night about midnight, the 10th inst, Prof Swift, director of the Warner Observatory, Rochester, N. Y., discovered another comet in the same constellation with the one recently found by Prof. Brooks. It is moving almost directly toward the earth, and hence shows very little motion, so that Prof. Swift found it difficult to verify and was unable to do so until last Saturday night. The two comets will very likely cross each other's orbits in their progress, and their appearance so nearly together, and within so short a space of time is a most singular, if not a significant fact.

Full varied and bright is the American Agriculturist for October. Each number is of such positive excellence that it seems a wonder to find every issue more attractive than its predecessors. While it has interest to the farmer with his many broad acres, the needs of the owner of a few rods of land, or a village lot, are equally provided for. True to its comprehensive name, "American," it has articles suited to all parts of our extended country. The engravings in the October number are even more numerous (over eighty) and telling than usual. The opening picture, or, rather, series of pictures, will appeal to many a Western pioneer, as it shows at a glance the history of hundreds of now prosperous families. The many interested in the question, "What cows shall I keep?" will be glad to see the portraits, from life, of the leading dairy breeds. The lovers of dogs—pure-bred, useful dogs, not curs—will find in the "Canine Portait Gallery," life-like pictures of the best breeds. Farm buildings of all kinds, from the snug cottage to the ample mansion, and from the spacious barn to the poultry house and piggery, have long been a marked feature of the American Agriculturist. The October number gives the elevation and plans complete for a cottage with French roof, and elegant, but not costly, carriage house and stable. Among minor buildings are: A plan of a house for raising chickens, after they are hatched by an incubator. Also, one for the economical feeding of sheep. Among articles of general interest are: "Editorial Notes" of Western travel, illustrating features of the "Far West." "Among the Cocoanuts" and an illustrated article on the "Negro Share Farmer," present phases of agriculture which are quite novel. The articles of practical utility to farmers and others everywhere are numerous. The hints on work for the month, on the farm, in the orchard, and elsewhere, are, as usual to the point. The little helps, the devices for saving labor and money, are as abundant as ever, and, when the subject requires, illustrated. The feeding of swine, a most important matter especially in the Western States, is treated in two articles; one, by Professor Thompson, of Nebraska, strikingly shows the importance of green food. The housekeeper will find many useful hints in her Department, and the children will find the usual amount of entertainment and instruction in their Department. A finely Illustrated supplement to this number gives much interesting matter, including Editorial Notes "Through Iowa and Minnesota to Dakota," and presents a most attractive list of premiums, in great variety, with which the American Agriculturist liberally rewards those who increase its subscription list. The following are among the writers in the October number: Prof. S. R. Thompson. Dr. A. Liautard, E. S. Renwick, George Thurber. Orange Judd, David W. Judd, William Clift, A. B. Allen, B. D. Halsted, M. C. Weld, S. B. Reed, Alfred Tramble, L. A. Beatty, L. D. Snook, J. M. Stahl, Elmer Lynnde.

During the coming year the American Agriculturist proposes to devote large space to information regarding the great West and Southwest, setting forth the character, climate, soil, price of lands, etc., etc., of various localities. This will be a leading feature of the paper, of great value to everybody who contemplate moving westward.

THE COUNTY FAIR.

The Red Lake Falls Messenger, in its last issue copies a portion of Mr. D. T. Herriott's letter in the JOURNAL, commenting on the Polk County Fair management and comments upon the letter thusly:

"This agrees with what we have heard of the matter, and it is evident that before another fair is held, a radical change is necessary, and the taxpayers will certainly not countenance the payment by the county, of bonuses for "horse trots," while the taxpaying farmers are left out in the cold. It is an encouragement that does not encourage, like protection that does not protect."

We have noticed, ever since our county fair, an evident itching on the part of Mr. Rothpletz, of the Messenger to get a chance to give our city a dig through the medium of the fair management and now he thinks he has got it. He admits that he did not take sufficient interest in his county fair to attend it, thus giving him a chance to speak advisedly about but that he depends on hearsay and from hearsay he proceeds to vent his spite against the city of Crookston by plainly intimating that the city of Crookston spent the taxpayers' money in premiums for trotting horses. Why, the fact is that there was not a fool in the county (before Rothpletz came) who does not know better than that. It is true that the managers of that fair live in Crookston, but, with one exception, the County Board does not and it is well known that one man on the County Board could not procure any aid for a horse trot, even if he had tried to do so which Rothpletz knows very well was never even tried. Now as to the fair management, if Mr. Rothpletz had been sufficiently interested in the agricultural pursuits of his patrons to post himself he would doubtless know more about it than he seems to. He would have found out that in the start every farmer in the county was invited, nay urged to take hold of the matter and help to make it a success. Men had taken the matter in charge who had as great an agricultural interest at stake as any farmer in the county, owning and cultivating large tracts of land. A great effort was made to secure the co-operation of farmers, who, it must be confessed, displayed a masterly inactivity in a matter that so greatly concerned themselves and, if the managers had not taken the matter in hand and sent out men to collect produce the agricultural part of the business must have been slim indeed. The managers of that fair—all of them just as good men as our good Brother Rothpletz, socially, financially, religiously, or any other wayly considered—have no apologies to offer for their management and need none. In fact they should be highly complimented for the manner in which they organized a financial victory out of what would have been a crushing defeat managed in any other way. Will Brother Rothpletz put his finger on ONE "poor taxpaying farmer" whom the management defrauded? If Bro. R. had had one iota of the experience in getting up a fair as he pretends to have in every other business under the sun, even he would know more than he thinks he does. He at least would know enough not to give himself away so badly by saying that the "taxpayers" of this county pay one cent of the premiums. He would then know enough to know that it costs money to get up any kind of a fair and that the money must come from somewhere. He would know that much of it comes from the entry money paid by horsemen, rents for stands, etc., etc. He would then know enough to realize that if he had put in as much money as the managers did, trying to make the fair a success, that he must get his money out of it or lose it. But the real fact of the matter is, we believe, that Mr. Rothpletz, in his zeal to build up Red Lake Falls, thinks he must first pull down every town in the county, and he has commenced on St. Hilaire and Crookston, and he thinks he has got a hefty lubber lift unto the very mudsills of Crookston's prosperity in this county fair business, simply because this city was the first to move in the matter of having a county fair at all. If this is not the fact why did he not organize a county fair himself and show Crookston how it should be done! (We only wish he had money enough to do it and would try it once.) We like to see a newspaper man zealous in protecting the interests of his readers, but when he goes so far out of his way as to misrepresent and pervert the facts as Rothpletz has in this case, he deserves to be sat down upon emphatically. If he had come down, looked over the fair and found out what the real facts were, then went back and urged his readers to take enough interest in the future to secure a proper representation of farmers, he would have done some good in the county, (perhaps) but not to come at all and then to do everything in his power to injure the interests of (what he claims to be) his own county, was playing the part of a renegade and a sneak. The JOURNAL has, time and again, urged the farmers in this county to organize agricultural societies, showing them the benefits thereof, and until that is done, and farmers will take sufficient interest in their own business, this county will never see a successful Agricultural Fair. It can never be done by lying on our oars until somebody else acts and then turning loose and kicking them all to pieces. Rothpletz knows that the fair was as much of a success as it could have been made under the circumstances, but takes a little, mean way of getting a dig at Crookston, whose prosperity makes his little soul sick. But let him rest. Crookston will be alive and prospering long after he has ceased to be a disturbing element in Polk County.

The notorious Fred Puhler, finding this new upper country to small a field in which to display his talents has determined to venture upon the sea of Journalism at the State Capital. Here's what the St. Paul Dispatch says of it: "Mr. Fred Puhler, the hero of the Ada Alert, the Brainerd Dispatch, and various other journalistic failures was met to-day and asked how his new evening paper was getting along, said he: 'I am going to occupy the field. I have already bought a press for $3,500, and material for $1,500. This leaves me $3,000 in bank, which is all the capital that is needed with which to start an evening paper in opposition to the Dispatch. I may use more capital, later on, but it will not be because I need it. I will make money from the start. ¶ I have one of the best business newspaper men in the country coming from Chicago; his name is McManus, formerly of the Chicago Herald, late of the News. I cannot get associated press reports, but I do not need them. I will have a special wire to Chicago. I am not afraid of the competition of the Minneapolis Journal or the Tribune, or of Mr. Dick Dude Smith's new evening paper. I think Dude Smith wants to start big. And I think he is talking just to keep possession of the field. I propose to start right away, and hold the field.'"

"Grass is wealth. As lowly and humble as it appears, it comprises about one-sixth of all the vegetation of the world. It nourishes more animals than all the other food combined, and furnishes all the elements for the growth of man. Through its wanderful chemical and vital qualities it extracts from the great labaratory of nature—the atmosphere—certain gases and fluids hostile to man's respiratory organs, thus purifying the air for his use, and depositing these elements in the soil, thereby enriching the earth. Hence the adage, 'No grass, no cattle; no cattle no manure; no manure, no grass.' This explains it all. Grass enriches the land and fattens cattle, cattle feed men and make manure, manure enlivens the soil and makes crop. There is an eternal evolution in this. Nothing is lost in this circle. Nature repeats her great law of the indestructibility of matter."—[Ex.

Farmers must all come to this conclusion sooner or later, "that a small quantity of land well and thoroughly cultivated, will yield a larger profit than the same amount of labor and means when applied to double the quantity of land. They can thus in a measure make themselves masters of the situation, and counteract the evil of an adverse season effectually. Many farmers have learned this, and those who have are not the ones who complain that the farm don't pay. They know it does, and they are willing to stick to it. There is no reason to doubt if the number of farms were doubled by making two of each, and concentrating the labor and manure now spread over one hundred acres upon fifty acres, the production of the half would exceed that of the whole on the old system of agriculture."—[Ex.

Fargo Republican: Minnesota editors are admonishing the farmers to save their straw for fertilizer, on the ground that the earth will not last always. If anybody knows how to use economy its an editor, and his advice on that point is not to be sneered at.

The Valley's Victory.

Fargo Republican: The harvest moon is waning; vast, immeasurable fields of grain that but a few weeks since nodded a joyful welcome to the golden sunlight and gaily tossed their heads in the gentle breezes, have humbly bowed themselves to the reapers' sickle and given up their coveted wealth to the world. The whir and clatter of the thresher that has blended harmoniously with the chorused voices of nature, has grown indistinct, and the clouds of smoke that rose from the stack of the engine and hovered over the shorn prairies like great spirits, as if remorseful at their own depredations, have melted away, and sunlit skies smile down upon passive fields that seem quietly to enjoy the happiness of their beneficiaries.

The past season has been one of unprecedented anxiety to the farmers; his resources weakened by his patient waiting, and his only hope being in the yield of the broad acres which he had cultivated so carefully, and on which he had labored so assiduously, he could not but be discouraged with the prospects that stared him in the face six weeks ago, when the clouds refused to give up the rain for which the earth and her offsprings so plaintively plead. It was indeed a dark foreboding season, and one which threatened to cast the glorious Northwest and her people into ruin, from which the most propitious circumstances, patient fortitude and determined struggle only would rescue them.

Herb is slinging on style. He indulges in a steam peanut roaster which takes the rag over anything seen in that line in our city. He says it is a straw burner.

Auction sale of one carload of good work horses and mares, also one span of mules, will be sold to the highest bidder for cash, or good notes, at Crookston, Saturday, Oct. 6th, at 2 p. m.

Aldermen Houston and Bang and Theo. Greenhalgh went to Beltrami last week on a big hunt. They bagged 25 nice fat geese and their boat didn't have to go to St. Paul after them either.

Ole Meldahl came over from Drayton, D. T., on purpose to pay us $1.65 on subscription and attend to some minor details of his farm work such as threshing, etc. He reports a yield of 17 bushels No. 1 Hard per acre.

Auditor McGuire rejoices in the receipt of a patent, from our good old Uncle Samuel, for 160 acres of as fine land as e'er the sun shone on. Said document arrived on Tuesday and now Mac will soon be a bloated land-holder like the rest.

O. H. Lucken, W. D. Hurlbut, Prof. V. D. Carruth, S. F. Markham, M. B. Hayes, E. M. Walsh and T. C. Shapleigh went over to Grand Forks to attend the ceremonies attendant on laying the corner stone of the University, on Tuesday. Prof. D. L. Keihle made an eloquent speech and others gave interesting little talks. The boys report a good time.

R. W. Rauney, the well man was up last week looking after his well business. He has finished the Simpson well getting an abundance of good water. He has lately struck a vein of water near Ada, in Norman County that flows 3,000 barrels per day. R. W. must be a happy chap, because, no matter how sick he may be he is always a well man.

Auction sale of one carload of good work horses and mares, also one span of mules, will be sold to the highest bidder for cash, or good notes, at Crookston, Saturday, Oct. 6th, at 2 p. m.

Mr. C. W. Dipple, who goes mit dot snare drums mit der pand, met with a severe accident while engaged in securing his crop. In some manner he slipped from a load of No. 1 Hard, in the sheaf and put dot knee-pan out o' joint on his right traveler. He wears a crutch in those days but can sit down and pound the tunes out o' that drum all the same as though nothing had happened.

We are told a good one on Dick Hussey. Last week he started out to pilot a gentleman to the happy hunting grounds at Beltrami and they sent their boat by train, on the same train that Houston, Bang and Greenhalgh's boat went. In some unaccountable(?) way the baggage-man was made to understand that the Houston boat was to go to St. Paul but made a mistake and took Dick's boat instead. Dick was all broke up when upon reaching Beltrami he found that his boat had gone and that the other fellows had theirs all right and were having lots of fun. That wasn't the way he wanted the joke to work.

Mr. Charles Churchill and family intend to go out to their claim next week.

Mr. O. E. Thomas, of Grand Forks, was an interested spectator at Wednesday's races.

It is said that Dunlap prefers an omnibus, street cars or any other kind of vehicle.

Robert Houston, Theo. Greenhalgh and Martin Bang are on the warpath, loaded for geese, this week.

Miss Pet Bunnell accompanied Dollie when she went back to resume her musical studies at St. Paul, and, after a pleasant visit returned to the old folks at home the first of this week.

W. G. Williams, of Arvilla, chairman of the Grond Forks Board of County Commissioners, was attending the races on Wednesday. Before Mr. W. left the Forks he insured the balance of the Board comfortable quarters by securely locking them up in the new jail.

Ole Bang calls attention to the large stock of liquors he has recently purchased of B. Alexander among which are some choice old Kentucky goods which he is prepared to sell to farmers and others in quantities less than 5 gallons at wholesale rates. He invites all who desire to obtain a strictly pure and good article to call upon him at his sample room on Main street next to Eiken Bros., hardware store.

The Phosa McAllister Company presented "Arrah Na Pogue," to a large audience on Wednesday evening. Miss McAllister's "Arrah" was a fine conception showing Miss McAllister's powers and graces as a true actress in a wonderful degree while the "Shaun" of Edwin Brink was no less well taken. The company, as a whole, is a good one and deserves a generous patronage which which we are pleased to notice they received in Crookston.

Mr. B. D. Uuderwood, representing the daily and weekly Fergus Falls Journal, gave us a pleasant call to-day as we were just about going to press. Mr. U. represents one of the livliest journals in the Northwest in fact one of the pioneers. The Journal, which started as a small country paper in the early days of Otter Tail County has grown to be the largest and best daily and weekly in the county and, we are pleased to note is meeting with the success it deserves.

The Races.

The first race on Tuesday was in the 2:32 class; entries, $100 Note, Julia J. and Prioress; won by $100 Note, Prioress 2d and Julia J. 3d. The second race was in the 2:50 class; entries were Brown Ned, Garabaldi and Rattler. Brown Ned won 1st money, Garabaldi 2d and Rattler 3d.

On Wednesday, the entries for the trotting race were Dictator, Gypsy Joe and Minneapolis. Gypsy Joe took the first two heats and Dictator the last three. The running race was between Forester and Vici. Forester easily won the race.

Lost.

On Wednesday Sept. 26th, while riding somewhere in the city or on Sampson's Addition I lost from my pocket one bank book, on the Merchants' Bank, one private account book and one small red book. These books are of no earthly use to anyone but myself and if the finder will kindly leave them at the U. S. Land Office he will be suitably rewarded.

PAUL C. SLETTEN.

Notice.

I desire to inform the public that although the late firm of Haseltine Bros., has been dissolved, yet I still continue the nursery business on the old nursery grounds at Crookston, Minn.

I introduced the nursery business at Crookston in the spring of 1879, on land I individually leased in my own name from Mrs. E. C. Davis, and which lease will not expire until October, 1884. In the autumn of 1881 I individually purchased, and now own, forty acres of land within the limits of the city of Crookston, which is well adapted for nursery purposes, and on which nursery stock is now growing and doing well. I have had nearly ten years experience in the nursery business in Wisconsin and Minnesota, and claim that my experience in the Northwest has been such as to enable me to fully determine and advise what varieties of nursery stock is best adapted to this Northwestern climate. In connection with the foregoing I desire to inform the public that E. W. Haseltine has no distinct nursery at Crookston. That when the late firm of Haseltine Bros. was dissolved in June, 1883, the stock of the old firm was divided and, by agreement then entered into, I stipulated to allow the said E. W. Haseltine to leave his share of the stock on my above mentioned lands, and leased lands, and the said E. W. Haseltine has agreed to remove from my said nursery grounds all his share of the stock so divided, on or before the first of June, 1884, and, in the meantime, to pay me rent for the use of a portion of said mentioned lands occupied by a portion of his share of the old firm stock. Hence I am the proprietor of the old Crookston nursery.

Thanking the public for its former patronage, I shall continue to fill all orders addressed to me, trusting that by fair dealing and promptness I shall continue to have the confidence and patronage of the public.

[22-tf] F. T. HASELTINE,
Prop. of the Crookston Nursery.
Crookston, Polk County, Minn.

N. B.

To all whom it may concern:

The old Nursery is on Mrs. Devis' ground instead of F. T. Haseltine's as above stated, and I am paying rent for the use and growth of my share of Nursery stocks upon said grounds, from this date until I am requested to remove my stock from her grounds next year to another plot for a Nursery. I will sell to all parties coming here for trees and shrubs at a much reduced rate. Residence one block north of court house. Correspondence solicited.

Very respectfully,
[21-tf] E. W. HASELTINE.

Mr. Jacob Stambaugh, the bonanza farmer of the Sand Hill River country, was in the city on Wednesday. In conversation with him he said he had never seen such soil to stand a severe drouth. "Why," said he, "here in the Red River Valley we have had a three months drough and have got a grand crop of wheat, while in the east it only takes from three to four weeks of drough to ruin everything." Mr. S. will spend the winter in Ohio, (trying to make converts to the New Northwest, we trust.)

The only way to meet this terrible foe is by good, reliable Insurance. Look over our Million List of staunch, fire-tested companies and make your selection before you have cause to regret a loss.

SNOW DROPS.—Beat to a cream one cup of butter and two cups of powdered sugar. Whip in thoroughly the whites of five well-beaten eggs. Add one cup of milk and three cups of prepared flour. Flavor with vanilla and nutmeg. Bake in tins the shape of fluted shells.

BEEFSTEAK A LA MAITRE D'HOTEL.—Cut the fillets or tenderest parts from some choice tenderloin steak. Shape them into neat oval pieces, each large enough for one person, and broil them daintily. Spread with maitre d' hotel butter and serve on a hot platter, surrounded by green peas or Saratoga potatoes and parsley.

STEWED KIDNEY.—Trim away the fat, skin and cut each kidney into thin slices; put the slices into a stew pan, dredging them first with flour; then put in a tablespoon full of butter, salt and pepper; let them simmer slowly fifteen minutes; then add a glass of claret and the juice of a lemon, boil ten minutes; serve the kidney in the sauce, adding some minced parsley.

STEWED KIDNEY.—Trim away the fat, skin and cut each kid ney into thin slices; put the slices into a stew pan, dredge them first with flour; then put a tablespoonful of butter, salt and pepper; let them simmer slowly fifteen minutes; then add a glass of claret and the juice of a lemon, boil ten minutes; serve the kidney in the sauce; adding some mince parsley.

Cinnamon Tarts please the children. To eight ounces of butter allow one pound of flour, one pound of brown sugar, three eggs; rub the butter and sugar to a cream, add the eggs, leaving out the white of one, stir in the flour, roll thin, and cut in three-inch squares; before putting into the oven, rub the top with the white of the egg, and sprinkle with cinnamon and sugar mixed. A blanched almond or an English walnut may be placed in the center, or may be broken in bits and a piece put at each corner.

BEANS AS FOOD.—The nutritive value of beans is very great—greater than any other article of food in common use. Considering their richness, they are probably the cheapest food we have, but somewhat difficult of digestion, probably owing to the fact that we rarely cook them enough and masticate insufficiently. In preparing beans for the table they should first be well soaked in cold water, then thrown into boiling water and cooked of a medium consistency, between a fluid and a solid, neither too thick nor too thin. They require some acid when eaten, and a sufficient amount of salt to render them palatable. They may be eaten with potatoes or other vegetables which contain more starch and less albumen, rather than with too much bread or meat.

CELERY MAYONNAISE.—The yolks of two eggs, a very little mustard, salt, pepper, the juice of a lemon and some water. Beat all together. To prevent the same curdling the eggs must be well beaten before adding the oil. Pour in the oil slowly, a few drops at a time, stirring until of the consistancy of jelly. A few drops of vinegar may be added, or a small spoonful of boiling water. The celery must be well washed and then thoroughly dried in a towel, cut in small pieces in a salad bowl, throw the mayonnaise over the celery, mix all together and serve.

PICKLED PEPPERS.—Green bell peppers make an excellent relish when properly prepared. Cut the top off, and with a sharp pen-knife remove the seeds; then put the peppers, the tops and all, in an earthen jar and pour cold water, well saturated with salt, over them; let them stand for two days in this, then change the water and make the brine weaker; let them remain in this a day and night; then take them out and fill them with chopped cabbage seasoned with salt and sugar. If you can obtain them, put in each pepper a tiny cucumber and two or three nasturtium seeds; crowd the filling in as hard as possible; as it will shrink when pickled; then with a crane needle and with cotton yard sew the tops of the peppers on; pour hot vinegar over them; lay some horseradish leaves over them in the jar, and set them in the cellar or in some cool closet.

One of the best coatings for tree wound is gum shellac in alcohol. It effectually excludes air and the wound quickly heals over.

Texas farmers sold last year $59,000,000 worth of cotton, $53,000,000 worth of cattle, $7,000,000 worth of wool and mutton and $1,000,000 worth of horses and hides.

Give the cellars a thorough renovating before you commence to store your fruits and vegetables.

Professor John W. Clark, of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, has set out this season 1000 apple trees, 290 pear trees and 3000 peach trees in his North Hadley orchard. He has 2000 peach trees from which he expects this season to get 1000 bushels.

Galled and sore shoulders in horses are often caused by the mane working under the collar while pulling. This can be avoided by plaiting the mane and tying it up in such a manner that it cannot touch the collar. It not only injures the shoulder but the mane also, which is one of the beauties of the horse.—Toledo Blade.

It is well to store potatoes in a dark, cool, dry cellar. Shallow bins are the best. Sweet potatoes that have been thoroughly ripened and dried in the sun may well be kept in a good dry cellar, where temperature is about forty degrees. Another plan is to pack them in boxes layered in clean, dry sand.

Dr. Hoskins, of Vermont, says: "Very few know the productiveness of the garden strawberry under good cultivation. I have picked four peck baskets from a square rod at a single picking. Crops of 200 and occasionally 400 bushels to the acre are reported, and 150 bushels are only a fair crop. At 10 cents a quart this crop will give a return of $470, more than half of which will be clear profit. There is not nearly the competition in late berries that there is in the early crop."

If the farmers of the country who own worthless dogs—curs without any breeding—could be induced to destroy them and substitute one well-bred shepherd pup, not more, to each farm, the wealth of every farming community would be vastly increased in many ways. Farmers soon find the collie saves them many a step. Eager and anxious to learn, willing to do anything within his power, the young dog needs only a wise and patient restraint and intelligent direction to become the most useful hand on the place.

It often occurs with many who have raised a fine crop of tomatoes in their gardens to find that they contain too much acidity or are too sour. This is owning to the soil or sheltered situation they have occupied. Tomatoes raised in a light, rather poor soil, in a sheltered or warm situation are always sweet in favorable seasons, while those raised in rich soil or in partial shade are always sour. When raised in a poorish light soil, they will ripen at least ten days earlier.

The Guenon theory of judging cows, says the Farm and Garden, is either true or false; for it cannot be both. Surely, if the delineations are that a cow will give a certain quantity of milk for a given length of time the system is complete if the results are in accordance with the claim. We are in the predicament of accepting a theory while rejecting it practically, for the best breeders hold the escutcheon marks in high favor, and yet dare not affirm that their best cows always have the most perfect escutcheons. If the theory is correct it enables any person to become an expert judge, and if it is not to be relied upon there should be no more nonsense about it.

The roofs of barns should be steep, and if of wood the surface either painted or the shingles dipped in lime water, to make them more durable. Straw and dirt collect under flat-roofed shingles and cause rapid decay.—New York Times.

D. Lovejoy, of Haddanfield, New Jersey, has raised a mammoth sunflower in his garden. Its weight is 13 1-2 pounds, and the seed surface is 21 1-2 inches in diameter.

What a Small Farmer Can Do.

A few days ago we were on an eighty-acre farm in Central Illinois. The owner has half the farm in grass, has several half and three quarter Percheron colts and young mares; all of which he has reared; has a fair stock of cattle, and is justly proud of his Poland China pigs, for which he finds a good demand from the farmers in the vicinity, for use as breeding stock. There is no shadow of doubt that he makes more money, does not have to work so hard, and enjoys his work more than he would if he followed the example of his neighbors and kept nearly all of his land in Indian corn. Probably forty acres will be added to the farm, this being all that is desired. Lack of fences on the farm is often a serious obstacle to stock raising. Where there are division fences, it seems certain that, in a majority of cases, it will pay better, even on comparatively small farms, to give considerable attention to rearing live stock than to grow grain exclusively.—Breeders' Gazette.

A Puzzling Cow.

The Philadelphia Press says that a full-blooded Jersey cow, named "Daisy, 25 years old, owned by Mr. John S. Jewell, residing near Princeton, N. J., dropped a fine calf on July 23, but had no milk for it. On August 1, she dropped a second calf, weighing 80 pounds, and the delayed milk fountain was then developed, so that both calves have now a supply. Taken altogether, this is an extraordinary case. The cow's age is itself out of the common, as well as the twin calves, while the cause for a difference of nine days in their ages and the delay of milk until the birth of the second, must form puzzles for the veterinary students sufficient to employ them for some time. Meanwhile it is pleasant to know that old "Daisy" was at last accounts in a fair way to raise her babies, which are doing well and greatly resemble each other.

Dresses for Afternoon Wear.

One pretty and very simple dress is as follows; First is a deep box pleated skirt of the cloth, and between each pleat is an arrangement of very narrow white braid laid on in vertical lines—five between each pleat. The tunic is a pointed apron-shape, laid in flat folds across the front, and in short full puffs in the back. A "masher" waistcoat—i. e., one made of white serge in copy of the old Louis XIV. gilets, with braided medallions and flat gold buttons on the wide flaps at the side—is worn underneath a cutaway jacket of the dark blue cloth, which has large turn-over cuffs and deep collar covered with braided medallions. The cuffs give the sleeve the appearance of having been rolled up from the hand. Another dress of rough black cloth is very neat. After every sixth kilt is a wide panel-pleat braided in silver in large medallions, six on each pleat. Two shawl points braided in the corners form the front of the overskirt, and the jacket, rounded at the sides, reveals a white silk waistcoat braided in the same style as the skirt, and fastened with a row of chased silver buttons.

Healthful and Helpful School Dress.

One of the most gratifying signs of progress is the general awakening in regard to school dress. It has hitherto been considered enough to discourage a lavish display of jewelry, but a girl could be thinly clad in cold weather; she should change from thick wool to thin silk, she should encase her arms in tight sleeves and pull her dresses together within a quarter of an inch of her life—and no one thought of protesting against her folly. But gymnastics in schools have accomplished something; they have established the fact that in ordinary dress the girl cannot raise or use her arms, and it has at last drowned upon teachers and intelligent mothers that she ought to be able to use them elsewhere than in the gymnasium. The appalling fact that there is barely a single strong woman in these United States has at last suggested that there may be some connection between health and dress; between dress and development; between the universal "nerves" and the universal anxieties, worries and tortures that assail women in regard to the ever recurring problems of their clothes. We talk of dress as "frivolous." It is the most serious question in the woman's life of to-day, and no girl or woman can accomplish any important work or purpose who has not practically settled it for herself.

The principal of one of the most fashionable schools in New York will not permit her pupils to wear a dress of any material save wool or cotton—the former in winter; the latter in milder weather, if they choose. A girl wearing a velvet suit one day was sent home with a message that her dress must be changed to one adapted for school wear. The mother of the girl returned a reply that it was a last year's suit which must be utilized or it would be outgrown. The teacher was inflexible. She said the school-room was no place for cast off finery: that the moral effect was bad and the final result worse than the present loss. The lesson was a salutary one, and if all teachers knew what was wanted in this respect and demanded it of their pupils much would be accomplished for the future generation of women.

An incendiary fire at Haley, Idaho, recently caused a loss of $50,000. Mrs. E. M. Stoston, who was keeping a lodging house, is under arrest for the crime. She was burned out twice in Deadwood and was heavily insured both times. Her property in Haley was also fully insured. W. A. Seamonds, an old miner, has been arrested as an accomplice.

Window Gardening.

Those who have plants in the ground which they intend for blooming in the window make a mistake if they delay taking them up until frost is threatened. If the plants have been left in the pots which have been plunged in the open ground the change is not so sudden, but if the plants have been turned out of the pots and their roots have been allowed free growth, it is another matter. With many plants turned out, the better plan is to raise new ones from cuttings for next winter's blooming, and let the old ones go. But it is often desirable to take up and pot an old plant. In such case do not wait until there is danger of frost, and then hurriedly dig up the plant and crowd its roots into a pot. Suppose the plant to be taken up is a geranium; begin at least a month before the time of removal to prepare it for the change. It will have made an enormous top which must be cut back, and the plant brought into a neat, compact shape. The change from the open ground to the pot should take place before cool nights have checked the growth.

BEAUTIFUL HOLLAND.

The Dutchman's Bijou of a Country, No Damp and Unpleasant.

Thoughtless persons, who have been little away from home, are apt to have dimly floating in what they are pleased to call their minds a notion that Holland is a damp, unpleasant country, where the overfed inhabitants grow tulips in defiance of inhospitable nature, and where life is a perpetual struggle against roaring waters, momentarily threatening to engulf the fields and villages. I know the French who are prone to imagine that the world ends at their frontiers, expressed much surprise when told by those who returned from the inauguration of the exhibition at Amsterdam that Holland was a "little jewel." and so it is—a right little—tight little bijou of a country—odd and original as possible, yet picturesque and charming in the highest degree. No sooner does the traveler leave behind him the Flemish land at Rosendaal—inspiring name—and enters upon the fat plains then the enchantment begins. It is a mistake to suppose that mountains are indispensable to picturesqueness. No Hollander would allow you to say that the physical features of his native land lack majesty, simply because they have no Zermatts and Grindelwalds. The vast plains, with their bending grasses, over which masses of shadow and floods of light are perpetually playing hide and seek; the willows pensive beside the canals; and these silent waterways themselves, with their miniature fleets of sail boats and ponderous barges laden with hay or iron-bound casks of beer and wine; the red-roofed villages, with their long streets bordered with pretty trees; the meadows in which the mottled cows are lying lazily, ready for the limning pencil of some new genius, and seeming to know that they "compose" beautifully for a painting; and the great arms of the sea, which take menacing hold on the green prairies—all these things have a certain grandeur of their own, and one which is admirably combined with beauty. Holland is in its prime in June. The Lusts in Rusts are in their perfection then. What delicious retreats from the bustling world are to be found beside the board and smoothly flowing Maas, or in this tree-embowered Hauge, with its parks and gardens even in the busiest streets, or northward, around Amsterdam—at Barmen—and an hundred similar places! There is a fund of reserve in the Dutch character which impels each proprietor to hedge and ditch himself round about, and, in short, to do his best to shut you out from the view of his villa, which is usually small, but exquisitely painted without and luxuriously furnished within. All over Holland one is perpetually catching momentary glimpses of these sylvan bowers—these "basky dells," where the hermit contemplation loves to sit over a flagrent pipe and a still more odious glass of "schnapps." One gets the impression of solid wealth everywhere in this diminutive land, and is at first inclined to wonder whence the riches come. But after he has seen the lines of stately ships crowding along the quays at Rotterdam, and has peered into the colonial department of a Dutch daily newspaper and got some small idea of the great movement of affairs in Batavia—after he has heard the Amsterdam bankers talk a trifle concerning their investments in a dozen countries, he begins to understand that this people gets its money by venturing abroad, at the same time that it neglects none of its interests at home.—Hague Corr. Boston Journal.

Where Water Does Not Rain Down, but Drops in Small Lakes

Correspondence o. the Boston Herald.

While the lack of water in Arizona is one of the most serious annoyances to the railroad, the presence of too much water is one of the railroad's gravest dangers. This is easily explained, paradoxical as it may seem. The sudden and furious storms which change dry gulches into torrents and surge against the railroad dump with tremendous force present one of the most curious and difficult problems in the maintenance of the railroad. You look out upon a stretch of sand glistening in the sun. Here and there are fissures and channels baked and dry, It is the picture of a dusty, parched waste. Not a drop of water is to be seen. Suddenly the sky is covered like black clouds. The rain descends like myriads of swiftly advancing lances. The landscapes before and behind is hidden by gray sheets of water pouring from the skies. Against the car windows the raindrops rush with the violence of bullets. There is a savage intensity in the storm which is fairly appalling. The train slackens its speed as though beaten back by the onslaught of the storm god. Water enters at the cracks of the doors, and you look anxiously at the windows, expecting them to give way before the rush of the tempest. You hear nothing save rain rattling like file firing and the roar of the storm. Presently a lull comes, and you are enabled to look out. Where is your parched desert? Along the sides of the track leap angry rivers, turbid and foaming tearing at the embankment like wild beasts seeking release from their prison walls and rushing at length madly through the culverts lashing right and left with terrible force The dry fissures in the soil are filled with eddying torrents, the sandy beds of sunken rivers are covered with a mighty tide, and the low plains lie floods of sullen water, whose wrath is spent. Then the sun comes out. Soon the torrents run more feebly, and in a short time the desert is parched and bare as before.

THE HIGHEST AUTHORITY.

Upon a Subject of Vital Interest, Effecting the Welfare of All.

The following remarkable letter from one of the leading and best known scientific writers of the present day is specially significant, and should be of unusual value to all readers who desire to keep pace with the march of modern discoveries and events:

"A general demand for information is one of the most distinctive characteristics of the nineteenth century. The common people, as well as the more enlightened and refined, cry out with no uncertain voice to be emancipated from the slavery of conservatism and superstition which has held the masses in gross ignorance during a large portion of the world's history, and in the time of the 'Dark Ages' came near obliterating the last glimmer of truth. Dogmatic assertions and blind empiricism are losing caste among all classes of all countries. People are beginning to think for themselves, and to regard authority much less than argument. Men and women are no longer willing that a few individuals should dictate to them what must be their sentiments and opinions. They claim the right to solve for themselves the great questions of the day and demand that the general good of humanity shall be respected. As the result of this general awakening, we see, on every hand, unmistakable evidences of reformatory action. People who, a few years ago, endured suffering the most intense in the name of duty, now realize the utter foolishness of such a course. Men who were under the bondage of bigoted advisers allowed their health to depart; suffered their constitutions to become undermined and finally died as martyrs to a false system of treatment. There are millions of people filling untimely graves who might have lived to a green old age had their original troubles been taken in time or properly treated. There are thousands of people to day thoughtlessly enduring the first symptoms of some serious malady and without the slightest realization of the danger that is before them. They have occasional headaches; a lack of appetite one day and a raverous one the next, or an unaccountable feeling of weariness, sometimes accompanied by nausea, and attribute all these troubles to the old idea of 'a slight cold' or malaria. It is high time that people awoke to a knowledge of the seriousness of these matters and emancipated themselves from the professional bigotry which controls them When this is done and when all class of physicians become liberal enough to exclude all dogmas, save that it is their duty to cure disease as quickly, and as safely as possible; to maintain no other position than that of truth honestly ascertained, and to endorse and recommend any remedy that has been found useful, no matter what its origin, there will be no more quarreling among the doctors, while there will be great rejoicing throughout the world."

"I am well aware of the censure that will be meted out to me for writing this letter but I feel that I cannot be true to my honest convictions unless I extend a helping hand and endorse all that I know to be good. The extended publications for the past few years, and graphic descriptions of different diseases of the kidneys and liver have awakened the medical profession to the fact that these diseases are greatly increasing. The treatment of the doctors has been largely experimental and many of their patients have died while they were casting about for a remedy to cure them."

"It is now over two years since my attention was first called to the use of a most wonderful preparation in the treatment of Bright's disease of the kidneys. Patients had frequently asked me about the remedy and I had heard of remarkable cures effected by it, but like many others I hesitated to recommend its use. A personal friend of mine had been in poor health for some time and his application for insurance on his life had been rejected on account of Bright's disease. Chemical and microscopical examinations of his urine revealed the presence of large quantities of albumen and granular tube casts, which confirmed the correctness of the diagnosis. After trying all the usual remedies, I directed him to use this preparation and was greatly surprised to observe a decided improvement within a month, and within four months no tube casts could be discovered. At that time there was present only a trace of albumen, and he felt, as he expressed it, perfectly well, and all through the influence of Warner's Safe Cure, the remedy he used."

"After this I prescribed this medicine in full doses in both acute and chronic nephritis, [Bright's disease] and with the most satisfactory results. My observations were neither small in number nor hastily made. They extended over several months and embraced a large number of cases which have proved so satisfactory to my mind that I would earnestly urge upon my professional brethren the importance of giving a fair and patient trial to Warner's Safe Cure. In a large class of ailments where the blood is obviously in an unhealthy state, especially where glandular engorgements and inflammatory eruptions exist, indeed in many of those forms of chronic indisposition in which there is no evidence of organic mischief but where the general health is depleted, the face sallow, the urine colored, constituting the condition in which the patient is said to be 'billious,' the advantage gained by the use of this remedy is remarkable. In Bright's disease it seems to act as a solvent of albumen, to soothe and heal the inflamed membranes; to wash out the epthelial debris which blocks up the tubuli uriniferi, and to prevent a destructive metamorphosis of tissue."

"Belonging as I do to a branch of the profession that believes that no one school of medicine knows all the truth regarding the treatment of disease, and being independent enough to select any remedy that will relieve my patients, without reference to the source from whence it comes, I am glad to acknowledge and commend the merits of this remedy thus frankly.

Respectfully yours,

The Glacier of Mount Tacoma.

I absolutely never believed there was anything in America comparable in grandeur to the scenery I have seen on my necessarily brief visit to Mount Tacoma. The access, thanks to the well-cut trails made by the engineer of the Northern Pacific Railroad is easy, and, as I learned from Mr. Oakes, will be made as easy as a carriage road, or nearly within a month from now. To express half my admiration for the transcendent grandeur of every part of the scenery, and especially of the glacier, would be impossible. A more perfect glacier, in all the features found in such phenomena, it would be impossible to find. Certainly no Alpine glacier excels it in perfection, and yet, as I was given to understand, it is at least, in point of size, of all that have been discovered on this mountain. I cannot help saying that I am thoroughly convinced that no resort in the United States will be so much sought after as this, when once people come to know that what men cross the Atlantic to see can be seen in equal splendo not surpassed at home.

I hear doubts expressed as to whether Mt. Tacoma can be ascended; but a steady head, a sure foot, a reliable alpenstock, and a little determination could probably accomplish what is of course a very daring feat. New Tacoma has a fortune in the fact that it is the best point from which to start to this, the grandest of all American mountains; and I learn from Mr. Oakes that guides and all conveniences will be afforded to tourists desirous of visiting this magnificent scene. If Switzerland is rightly called the playground of Europe, I am satisfied that around the base of Mt. Tacoma will become a prominent place of resort, not for Americans only, but for the world besides.

I need not deal with the particulars of our journey, as you can get them minutely logged by my young friend, Lieutenant Arthur. Let me only add this much in this regard, that nothing could be, to me at least, more enjoyable than the gradual approach to the inner circle of the court where the monarch of our northern mountains reigns supreme. The emotions stirred in one's breast—at least they were in mine—completly defy all the powers of language to express. When we reached the foot of the glaciers, foot-sore and weary as we were, I could not help pausing in breathless silence as we reviewed this majestic mass of ice, imbedded in the bosom of this gigantic monarch among Alps. If it was not the grandest of the group, as we were informed by Mr. Willis, who was one of our party, it was enough magnificence for us. The stupendous sides of the canyon in which the glacier lay formed a setting perfect in its harmony of contrast, if the term be admissible, to the pagodas and pinnacles of the secluded mass of ice.

I have been through the Swiss mountains, and I am compelled to own that, incredible as the assertion may appear, there is absolutely no comparison between the finest effects that are exhibited there and what is seen in approaching this grand, isolated mountain. I could give you the dimensions, approximately, of the glacier we visited but it would not be necessary, as I understand your paper is about to send a special expedition to the scene in a day or two. I consider you will be doing good service by so doing. I would be willing to go 500 miles again to see that scene. This continent is yet in ignorance of the existence of what will be one of the grandest show places, as well as a sanitarium.

This morning, in spite of the fact that we came from the Glacier to Tacoma in one day and felt just as used up as you represented us on our arrival last night, we felt every one of us this morning as lively as possible, and with the exception of a little stiffness, just as capable of the same exertion as we were before we started.—Senator Edmunds, in the Portland Oregonian.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

LURED TO HIS DOOM.

BY AN ENGLISH DETECTIVE.

It was a very singular, mysterious and complicated case.

In a bare room of an old house in the vicinity of London Bridge Railway Station a man was found dead, hanging by a small cord to a hook driven into the wall, his feet resting on the floor.

He was discovered some days after his death, and by reason of the strong smell from his decomposing body.

He was a stranger, whom no one knew, and why he should have come to that place to commit suicide was a mystery.

He was well-dressed, had a gold watch in his pocket, to which was attached a heavy gold chain; he had a diamond stud in his shirt-front, and a cluster ring of diamonds on one finger; he had also a pocket-book on his person containing over two hundred pounds in bank notes.

It was therefore evident that he had not committed suicide on account of poverty, nor murdered for his money.

Was it suicide, or was it murder?

There was no scrap of paper on his person to tell who the stranger was, nor his motive for the murderous deed, if he did it.

The room, which was an upper story of an old building, the lower portion of which was occupied by a commission agent, contained no article of furniture.

It had been rented about ten days previous to a rather venerable-looking man, who walked a little lame and wore goggles, who said he wanted it for an office for the sale of a patent that would soon become very popular with sea-going people.

When questioned about the patent, he said he would not then explain it, but would have some things on hand for exhibition in the course of ten days or two weeks.

The dead man was not the man who had taken the room, however, and how and when he had got access to the apartment no one knew.

There was an old-fashioned fireplace in the room, and some paper ashes in this attracted the attention of a detective, who happened to be no other than my humble self.

In turning over these ashes I discovered two or three little bits of paper not entirely consumed, and they had these words written on them, though now barely distinguishable:

found her and locked
meet you station G.

Now, after reading these disjointed sentences, I began to study and ponder them.

Might not this be a portion of the message sent to the dead man, to lure him to the city for the purpose of putting him out of the way?

But for what motive?

Ah; that indeed I could not know—that was something to be found out after a serious investigation, in case one should be made.

I examined the charred papers as well as I could, and reached the conclusion that what I had read was a part of a telegram which had been sent by somebody from London and received by somebody at a distance, and that either the sender or receiver intended to destroy it.

Now, if the deceased had received it, it must have been sent to him by somebody, and that somebody intended to meet him, and probably did meet him, at the railway station.

Well, then, where was that somebody and why had he allowed his correspondent to visit that out-of-the-way room alone and commit suicide, without ever going near him afterward?

And why should the man come to such a place to kill himself?

And could he have found the room without a guide, and got access to it unknown to any one, if he were not the man who had rented it in the first place?

But then it was certain that he was not that man unless he was disguised when he hired it; and why had he gone to all that trouble merely to hang himself, when he could have done it quite as effectually in ten thousand better places?

No look on it—reason as I might—I could not bring myself to believe that the stranger hanging in that bare room had put the rope around his own neck.

I told the coroner of my belief; but whether he coincided with me or not, it is certain his jury did not, for they brought in a verdict of suicide.

The body was placed in the mortuary for recognition and I requested that it should be kept there as long as possible, for I had a desire to see what I could do in working up the case.

I started out with the bits of paper I had secured, to see if I could find at any telegraph office any message recently sent off, embodying the words I had transcribed in their consecutive order.

I was soon fortunate in getting possession of what I believed to be the original message.

It was addressed to Horace Granger, 187——street, Manchester, and read as follows—the words found among the paper ashes I enclose in brackets:

I have [found her and locked] her up in a [private room.] Come on and use a parent's authority. Take the last day train, and I will [meet you] at London Bridge station.]

Judging from this, it was a case of a runaway daughter, whom "G." had followed and captured in London, and whom the anxious father had come on to see and probably take back with him.

As the dead man appeared to be not far from five-and-thirty years of age, it was natural to suppose that no daughter of his could be beyond her teens.

A school girl, perhaps, who had played truant and ran away.

But, then, if she had been caught and locked up, it was not reasonable to suppose it had been in that bare room in a mercantile building that contained no other lodgers.

And then again, if the father had come on and found her, what had become of her, and of "G.," who had sent the message? and why had the father remained behind to hang himself?

Or the girl, assisted by "G.," murdered her father?

In any event, the affair was one of great mystery, and on privately reporting my discoveries to my chief, I received the welcome order to work it out to the end.

To do this properly I immediately went to Manchester.

The address took me to a large elegant mansion in the suburbs, which led me to believe that the owner was a person of means.

I did not ring, enter and state my business, but visited the nearest apothecary, as the man most likely to know the general facts about his neighbors.

"Would you be kind enough to answer a stranger in the city a few questions?" I said to the dispenser of medicines.

"Proceed," he replied, looking curiously at me.

"Do you know a gentleman by the name of Horace Granger?"

"I do."

"What is his business?"

"He is a broker."

"Is he reputed wealthy?"

"He is."

"Has he a family?"

"A wife and daughter."

"About what age would you judge him to be?"

"About thirty-five."

"And his daughter?"

"About thirteen."

"Is Mr. Granger now at home?"

"I cannot say. I have not seen him for more than a week."

"Is his daughter at home?"

"I think not. I think she is away at boarding school."

"Pardon me, sir, if I seem too inquisitive," said I; "but I have a reason beyond mere curiosity for all the questions I ask, and some time, if not just at this moment, you shall know all. Could you tell me if he is on good terms with his wife?"

"Ha!" he said, with a start, "Is this some scandal for a law court to which I may be called as a witness?"

"No, sir. On my honor, no use of your name shall be made in connection with any information you may give me."

"Well, then," he answered, with a peculiar smile, "it is rumored—that he is jealous of a certain gentleman to whom he has no reason to be, and that he has all confidence in one who may yet turn out to be a treacherous villian."

This was becoming very interesing to me.

"May I venture to ask the name of this second party."

"Well, sir, as you are a stranger to me," replied the druggist, "I will not mention any name; but if you should ever have business with the head clerk of Horace Granger, it is my opinion you will be within a hundred miles of the party!"

"Thank you," I said feeling pretty sure of my course.

After some further questions I left the apothecary, and repaired to the office of Horace Granger, the street and number of which I had ascertained.

I found a tall, dark, muscular, sinister-looking clerk, about thirty years of age, standing at a desk behind the counter.

"Is Mr. Granger in?" I asked.

"No!" was the curt reply.

"Will he be in soon?"

"Don't know."

"Has he been in to-day?"

"Can't say."

"Was he in yesterday?"

"Can't say."

"Will he ever be in again?"

The man started and looked at me, for the first time, in a quick, searching way.

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"Has he come back with his daughter?" I questioned, in turn.

He again started, came forward, and sharply scrutinized my person; but, as I fancied, with a guilty conscience.

"Who are you? What do you want here? And why these impertinent questions?" he demanded, in a fierce way.

"Don't you know that Horace Granger is dead?" said I, fixing a look upon the fellow that made him quail.

"Dead!" he echoed, in well-assumed amazement and horror. "Good heavens! How? When? Where?"

"How?—by hanging; when?—six days ago; Where?—London," I answered categorically.

"You take away my breath!" he almost gasped.

"What is your name?" I queried.

"George Grenham."

"Ah, yes—the 'G.!'" I thought.

"You knew Mr. Granger went to London nearly a week ago, to find his daughter?" I proceeded.

I saw the man turn pale and shudder, as he answered in a mumbling, confused way:

"I believe—he did—go—somewhere."

"But his daughter was not in London, you know?"

I said this at a venture, for I fancied I had divined the plot.

"Why, how did you know that? —that is—I mean—"

"Never mind," I interrupted. "His daughter was not there, but you were."

"Man!" and his eyes fairly glared.

"You had been there before, in the disguise of an old man," I went on; "you had engaged a room in a commercial house to exhibit a patent; you went on again, and telegraphed to your employe that his daughter was found and locked up, and to come on the last train, and you would meet him at London Bridge station. You did meet him; it was in the night; you took him to the room you had previously engaged; you fell upon him; you garroted him; you hung him up to the wall; you burned the telegram, and then you hastened back here to play the role of innocence."

I went through with my accusations so rapidly, giving the villian no time for consideration or even interruption—I pulled one fact upon another so quickly and surely, that I seemed to the guilty wretch to be an eye-witness relating what I had seen; and I brought the whole damaging scene so vividly to his mind's eye that, with a face distorted with horror and covered with the sweat of mental agony, he staggered back, sank down and, half groaned and half shrieked out;

"Good heaven, have mercy!"

Well, I had my clew; but before I could make much use of it the murderous scoundrel blew out his own brains.

It turned out, in settling the estate of the murdered broker, that his murderer had been his confidential man of business and trusted friend; that the latter had systematically robbed his employer of many thousands of pounds, and that he had concocted the hellish plot of murder which I have thus revealed.

Of course the affair made quite a sensation in certain circles at the time, but was kept as much as possible from the public at large, and was soon hushed up and forgotten by everybody not in any manner interested beyond the mere curiosity and scandal of the hour.

What part the wife had in the wicked plot I do not know.

I, of course, won the distinguished approval of my chief for the part I had taken in the dark affair, and that proved of much importance to me in the future of my profession.

A Singular Incident of the War.

Petersburg (Va) Index-Appeal.

In the early part of 1864 a short but spirited fight occurred at a place in East Tennessee called Dandridge, between a part of Longstreet's corps and a considerable force of federal cavalry. Many were killed on both sides. Among the confederate dead was a man named Seaford, from North Carolina, who had been Professor of mathematics in one of the colleges of that state, and who was one of the finest looking men we ever saw. He was a private in the Washington Light Infantry from Charleston, S. C., and would not accept a commission, though it was tendered him several times. He was buried on the spot where he was killed, and his comrades returned to their quarters—several miles away. About two weeks after the fight a letter came to his address. The captain of the company opened it, and it proved to be from a young lady to whom Seaford was engaged to be married. It was written on the very day the fight occurred at Dandridge, related a dream the writer had just had, in which she saw Seaford lying dead on the battle-field shot through the left breast—describing the death wound exactly as it was, and even the topography of the field, though she had never seen it, and in all probability knew nothing of the battle. She begged him to send her a lock of his hair, as a sacred memento should anything happen to him.

Unfulfilled.

Persons who are in the habit of attaching undue significance to what they call their "presentiments," may learn something from an experience of the Emperor of Germany. While inspecting the Karlsbad pavilion at a hygienic exhibition he noticed a small china cup, bearing the date 1863, and decorated with a blue silk ribbon. On inquiry, he was informed that this was the cup from which he had taken the waters at Karlsbad in 1863, preserved in memory of his visit.

Taking the cup in his hand, the Emperor said, with a smile, "Yes, I remember that time very well. It's twenty years ago, and yet it nearly seems as if only months had passed since then, my recollections are so vivid. They remind me of a small episode which, perhaps, I may tell you. One night I dreamt I stood at the Kur-spring and a man handed me a cup containing poison. When I awoke I laughed at this dream, for every morning at the spring I received my cup from the hands of a charming girl, and that she had no desire to take my life I felt positive.

"That morning, I went to the spring at the usual hour; but when I found a man present this time waiting to hand me the cup, instead of the girl, who was prevented from coming by illness, or some other reason, then the memory of my dream made me feel quite uneasy and shivery for a moment. I remained uncertain for some instants, but then I suppressed my suspicions, saying to myself: 'The good Karlsbaders cannot have any thoughts of my murder.'

"'I looked once more at all the pleasant surroundings, and I emptied the cup at a draught! Of course it did not harm me. On the contrary, my stay at Karlsbad was very beneficial to me."—Youth's Companion.

MARENGO CAVE.

An Astonishing Discovery in Crawford County, Indiana—A Rival to Mammoth and Luray.

Sunday morning, the 9th inst., five young men—Charles Jones, Sherman Stewart, John Jones, Mitchell Stewart, and Morton Patterson—were strolling around on the outskirts of the village of Marengo, or Springtown, in Crawford county, when it was proposed to explore a hole discovered in the ground, in the bottom of what had been one of the sink-holes common to that part of the country. Lights were procured, and the first two, being more venturesome, started on an exploring expidition. They had not gone far until the fact dawned upon them that they were in a vast cavern whose dimensions might prove greater than they cared to explore. Some specimens of stalactites and other formations were gathered up and taken out to their companions as proof that they had found a cave. The whole party then ventured in, and, gaining courage from numbers, they went into the subterranean cavern to the distance of a half mile or more, finding many strange formations, and seeing some of the beauties of one of the most beautiful caverns ever discovered. Of course when they came out they spread the report, and soon the villagers were in a state of considerable excitement. Several parties ventured into the cave to confirm or deny the reports of the young men. But the more it was seen the more the wonder grew. The news spread, and when it reached New Albany a representative of the Ledger was dispatched to investigate the matter.

At Marengo, a little station on the Air-Line railway, thirty-three miles from this city, it was learned that the cave was a reality. Several citizens had explored it, and their reports agreed it was well worth a visit.

The entrance is in the edge of a woods, and is quite a cozy little place. It is on the farm of Samuel Stewart, a veteran of 72 years, and an old citizen of the neighborhood. Within the last few days he has put a board covering over the entrance and a door which is kept locked, and no one is admitted except by his consent. Mr. Stewart proposes to charge about 50 cents for admittance, and guides can be procured at reasonable rates. Plank steps lead about 15 feet downward; then a gradual slope extends probably twenty feet further into a large hall, the bottom of which is in places sandy and in other places a hard crust of clay and sand. On each side and overhead may be seen at short intervals beautiful specimens of stalactites and stalagmites in every shape and form, from the delicate pendant with frost-work rivaling the feathery tracery of the pencil of the frost king upon the pane of glass, or imitations of drapery such as fill the dreams of the wanderer in the vale of Cashmere, to pillars as massive as those which support the dome of the capitol at Washington. The eye is filled with wonder and the mind with awe in viewing this work of nature, which has been quietly building up these formations drop by drop for countless ages. One can come to realize some of the unseen forces of nature, the results of which are spread out before him in these vast halls; but the eye cannot see nor the mind conceive all the beauties of nature's work.

One of the largest halls has, by permission of Mr. Stewart, been named Ledger Hall. It stretches across one of the long halls, in some sixty feet long and about forty feet high, and in the grandeur is almost if not quite equal to the large hall in Mammoth cave.

Near this lie some stones, evidently fallen from the roof, which would prove valuable in the market. One of them is thirty feet long, eight feet wide, and and nine inches thick, and is of blue limestone. How long they have lain there cannot be told, but as large stalagmites have formed on some of them, it is probable that many years have passed since their fall.

Further along may be found Arthur avenue filled with fine gypsum formations, and President island, an immense mass of earth strongly impregnated with saltpeter.

In one of the walls beyond President's island can be seen fantastic pictures of birds, beasts and reptiles which strongly resemble some dilapidated show bills remaining on dead walls after the show has come and gone. They are, perhaps, relics of some prehistoric Barnum. Pillared palace lies beyond the island and is one of the grandest sights in the cavern. Huge stalagmites have grown up to meet the pendant stalactite and formed pillars of granite dimensions. The Jersey Lily is pointed out near this point, a formation representing a woman. Being a beautiful specimen it is very naturally named after the most beautiful woman in the world.

Statue hall is another scene of mingled beauty and grandeur. Seen well lighted, it strongly resembles a large hall filled with marble images from the sculptor's hands. As the light penetrates the blackness of darkness which envelopes them, "shadowing forth the forms of things unknown," a scene is formed upon the mind never to be forgotten. After traveling from one and a half to two miles through what is now called the main cave, without finding an end to it, the party retraced their steps, finding new wonders on the return, and entered a lateral branch called Stewart's grotto. This is, so far, considered the handsomest part of the cave, and may well be so pronounced, as it is literally filled with wonders. At its entrance stands what has been christened diamond dome, from the fact that it is covered with small particles of gypsum, so bright that they reflect the rays of light and give the dome the appearance of being covered with minute diamonds.

A short distance further is seen formation bearing a striking resemblance to the great American ant-eater, an animal very rare, to say the least of it, in this country. But the likeness is really remarkable.

Jumbo's pillar is another of the curiosities to be seen close by those last mentioned, and is the largest pillar yet discovered in the cave, and is named after the largest known animal.

Organ hall had been so named for the reason that at one end of the same there is a perfect representation of a large organ with the pipes and ornamented top-piece all complete. Large flued pendants drape the walls of the halls, which being struck give forth sounds ranging from soft, flute-like notes to the deep-toned chords of the grandest pipe organ. The organ looks down on what might be called a hillside graveyard, as on a gentle slope stand numerous stalagmites glistening in their whiteness like the marble monuments in some lone city of the dead.

Crystal palace lies just beyond Organ hall, and no real palace ever shone or glistened in the sun as does this subterranean phantasmagoria, which was christened the palace on account of its dazzling beauty as reflected from the flickering lights. Columns of alabaster whiteness, mammoth shells incrusted with shining carbonate pebbles and filled to the brim with pure cold water, out of which rise pillars of fantastic shape and weird beauty are here seen.

Colums might and doubtless will be filled in attempts to describe Marengo cave, but pen pictures convey but a poor idea of its many wonderful and beautiful sights, Mr. Stewart, the owner, will take steps to have it explored, and as it is only a short walk from the railway station to the entrance, there will no doubt be numerous visitors.

There are various opinions as to the course of the cave, but the general trend is southward in the direction of Wyandotte cave, about ten miles distant, and it is possible that the two great Crawford county caves may be found to unite and form one monster cavern of greater dimensions than the Mammoth, the largest cave ever known. Further explorations and careful surveys will determine whether there is any foundation for this theory.

By a test made by a small thermometer the temperature at about a quarter of a mile from the entrance of the cave was found to be 52 degrees. This is 7 degrees colder than the Mammoth and 4 degrees below Wyandotte.

Two years ago a lady at Middletown, N. Y., found a little tree toad on a large calla lily which she had potted in the house. He was adopted as the pet of the household, and made his home on the lily until last fall, when he disappeared presumably in the depths of the pot. He was not seen or heard of until a few months ago, when he reappeared, bringing his wife with him. Whether he involved her from the depths of his consciousness, or whether he found her in the earth, is a problem that is puzzling the household.

A very good story is told of Cham the caricaturist, who died in 1879, and who had very long legs. One day he went into a tailor's shop, chose some cloth and agreed to give the price of forty-five francs for a pair of trousers. The tailor took his measure and went lower and lower, while his astonishment went higher. At last he stopped a little below the knee and threw his measure over his shoulder. "Well," said Cham, "why do you stop?" "Monsieur, for forty-five francs I can't go lower," was the reply of the tailor.

To build a ship so that in case of accident to the bow the stern half can be instantaneously seperated from it, and can continue the voyage securely and easily on its own account, is the latest contribution to the list of safegaurds against the dangers of the sea. The idea is that of a German inventor, and is set forth with some detail in the Hamburg Courier, which sees no reason why it should not be entirely feasible. It would require many departures from the present mode of building vessels, as well as for their internal arrangement and equipment but the inventor asserts that, as a whole, a vessel so constructed could be fully as seaworthy and swift as any built on the present plan, and would be twice as secure against disaster.

The experiments made by Prof. Forbes with wire to determine the thickness required for carrying electric currents without overheating have attracted considerable attention. The result of these experiments, according to the announcement, appears to be that if a definite amount of current be carried through a wire of a certain diameter without heating it to a temperature of above 150 degrees, then, in order to carry a current twice as great, without overheating, the wire used must be twice the diameter or four times the section. This, if correct, is considered quite important, the size of conductors being an element largely affecting the cost of a plant for electric lighting, and conductors liable to be overheated greatly increase the cost of the current, besides being dangerous.

A Work of Art in Danger.

The equestrian statue of Andrew Jackson, by Clark Mills, which stands in the Capitol grounds at Nashville, Tenn., is said to be in danger of tumbling down, which would insure its destruction. It was erected in honor of Nashville's centennial three years ago. It appears that the temporary base which was improvised for it rests on wooden trestles, the least giving way of which would, it is said, throw the statue to the ground and destroy it. It was intended that it should remain on the wooden supports only until an appropriation could be obtained from the legislature to be used in the purchase of a marble base. Accordingly, $5,000 was asked for that purpose, but the legislature thought that sum excessive, and finally appropriated $2,000, the act also providing for the appointment of a committee to carry out the object designed. The committee, however, after taking some preliminary action in the matter, seems to have stopped there and left the statute to take care of itself. This neglect has given rise to much indignant comment. The people feel that it would be a pity to have so great a work destroyed, especially as Mr. Mills has claimed that this statue is the best of the three made by him, because it is the last one, and is a decided improvement on the other two. The two others are at Washington and New Orleans, and cost $30,000 each. The Nashville statue was obtained for $5,000, the amount having been subscribed by citizens.

LOST IN THE FOREST.

Frightful Experiences of a Family Who Missed Their Way.

A dispatch from Bradford, Pa., says: William Batterson, of Buffalo, who is building a basket factory at Howard's Hill, left this city a few days ago to drive to the place, accompanied by his wife and children. The locality is an isolated one among the mountains, and the road leading to it lies for a great part of the way through a deep forest. While passing through the wilderness Mr. Batterson became bewildered in the darkness and lost his way. After many attempts to discover the road he finally let the horse take its own course through the woods, following it with a lighted lantern. After floundering aimlessly about for sometime, they came suddenly upon a railroad track. Mr. Batterson did not know what road it was, but felt that there must be a station or a road crossing somewhere in the vicinity. He at first intended to walk along the track until he came to one or the other, but his wife was afraid to remain alone in the woods, so they concluded to take the chances of meeting a train and drive along the track in search of a way out of the wilderness.

Mr. Batterson led the horse on the track and walked on ahead with the light. Mrs. Batterson and the children followed in the carriage. A mile or more was traveled without finding any crossing or indication of a station, and then to insure the safety of his wife and children, Mr. Batterson took them from the carriage, and they followed it on foot by the side of the track, so that at the sound of the approaching train they could climb the bank.

After going a quarter of a mile further they came to a bridge. They could not retrace their steps, and they resolved to share the risk of keeping on their way and attempting the crossing. They found a narrow plank foot-path at one side, and Mr. Batterson succeeded in leading his horse upon it. The wheels on one side ran on this walk but on the other side they bumped along the ties. The bridge was swept by a high wind, and it was with difficulty that Mrs. Batterson could make her way along with her two children. To add to the terror of the situation a gust of wind extinguished the lantern. The darkness was intense, and they groped their way along slowly, tortured by the fear that they would be crushed or hurled from the bridge by a train before they could reach a place of safety. They were nearly half an hour in crossing it, and then they found themselves in a narrow rock cut, through which they felt their way and stumbled along, and when they finally emerged from it they were almost overcome with joy to see a light just ahead of them. At the same moment they heard the whistle of an approaching train. The horse was turned off the track into an open space below the cut, which proved to be a road, and Mrs. Batterson and the children followed it to a place of safety. They had not gone twenty feet from the track when a coal train went rushing by into the cut.

Both Mr. Batterson and his wife were so overcome with the sense of their peril that it was some time before they could proceed. When they were able to go on they found that they were at a small station known as Palen's Switch. They had driven for a mile and a-half over the most dangerous portion of the Johnsonburg Extension of the Erie Railway, and had crossed the great Kinzua viaduct, the highest railroad bridge in the world, which spans the Kinzua ravine at a height of 303 feet above the creek. The viaduct is nearly half a mile long. Their escape from death was owing solely to the stopping of the north-bound coal-train a mile below the rock on account of a hot journal. The train was due at the cut just as they were picking their way through it. Howard's hill was only four miles from Palen's Switch.

Death of Marwood.

London Standard.

Marwood, the executioner, died at 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon at Horncastle from conjestion of the lungs and jaundice. He was sixty-three years of age, and had held his post for twelve years. He leaves a widow, but no son, as has been stated. Some incidents of his life are narrated by a local correspondent who was personally acquainted with Marwood, and who had a long conversation with him only a fortnight ago. He says: "There were many attempts to get a portrait of Marwood, but he always refused. An enterprising photographer offered him fifty pounds one day for a sitting, but he declined, his explanation being that one of the things he enjoyed more than anything else was to go into a town by an earlier train than he was expected, and mix in the crowd that was awaiting his arrival. If his correspondence has been preserved it will be very curious. Quite recently he showed me a sword of a Japanese executioner which had been sent to him by a gentleman from Brighton, and it was certainly of considerable intrinsic value. He had contemplated, he said, putting another story on to his shop, and making a kind of museum, where he could show his friends and neighbors the peculiar things he had collected during his experience as an executioner. Once only had he an interview with Calcraft, and that was when a party of Americans had asked to be allowed to see Calcraft. Marwood went with some official to ask Calcraft if he would receive the visitors. He used to declare that previous to the execution in Ireland, when a prisoner's arm caught in the rope he had never had a single slip in his work. With regard to the Durham execution, concerning which he was summoned to the home office, immediately after the question had been put in parliament, he stated that the prisoner fainted at the last moment, and that this was the cause of the rope catching in his arm, and he was particularly careful to mention that at the inquest and satisfactorily cleared himself. His opinion was that in all future executions a warder should stand on each side of the prisoners on a plank extending over the drop and the loose portion of the rope be tied up to the beam by a slight cord, which should give way by the weight of the body, and he declared that he should never undertake an execution again without these precautions being adopted. Many of the Irish experiences were a source of great amusement to him. An escort used to meet him at Chester, and accompany him across the Channel. After some of the early executions connected with the Phœnix Park assassinations Marwood had to proceed to Glasgow, and he related how an escort which was to accompany him were disappointed when he found that he declined their company and intended to move about England without any protection whatever. It was at Glasgow while he was preparing the prisoners on the scaffold that a letter was received by the governor of the jail which might have been a respite. The governor signalled to Marwood while he read the letter, which proved to be on other business. Marwood received very few threatening letters.

A colored man living on Wilkins street was ordered by the Sanitary police some time since to abate a bad-smelling nuisance at his back door. The other day the officer who served the notice met the man on the street and asked:

"Well, what did you do?"

Perhaps the meanest ghost in all this broad, fair land of ours, is haunting an old house in Peoria, Illinois. The spectre shuffles around the room a little, and occasionally bangs the china and scratches at the doors, just enough to keep the garrison on the alert; but his colossal meaness is apparent when he makes it his delight to go out doors and excite the dogs into convulsions of rage by teasing them, and inducing them to bite savage but futile bites at the impalpable legs of their ghostly tormentor. You wouldn't think a ghost could be so mean as that, now, wouldn't you?

There is a great difference between the almshouses in the different states. Now, for instance, in Philadelphia, the superintendent only steals the roof off the almshouse, and sells it; but in Tewksbury they take the skin off the pauper and tan it. On the whole, as the skin isn't taken off until the pauper is dead, the Tewksbury method is preferable.

"Well, Father Brown, how did you like the sermon yesterday?" asked a young preacher. "Ye see, parson," was the reply, "I haven't a fair chance at them sermons of yours. A square little man was very corpulent, very stiff-necked, and very much out of sorts, halted a policeman at the corner of Jefferson avenue and Wayne street yesterday and said:

"Ha, sir, but what kind of a city is this, sir? Ha! (blowing his nose) it strikes me that you're a queer set."

"Anything wrong?"

"Ha, sir, yes (blow sir! I came from ——with the excursion. I had scarcely put foot on the street when a boy called me a caravan, sir! Ha! (blow) a caravan, sir! Ha! (blow) a caravan!"

"He shouldn't have done it."

"And a stranger slapped me on the back and yelled hello, pard? in my ear! Yes, sir, (blow) he did sir—in my ear, sir!"

"That was wrong."

"And a bootblack, sir (blow), had the impudence to call my feet freight cars, and to ask me what line I run on! Yes (blow), sir—what line I run on! Ha! sir."

"He deserved arrest."

"Ha! he (blow) did, sir. I want the people of Detroit to understand that I'm worth $14,000, sir, mostly in cash—mostly in cash, sir."

"Yes."

"And I've been a justice of the peace for twenty two years, sir! Ha! (blow) sir."

"Is it possible?"

"Yes, sir. (A long blow.) And when one of your villains calls out to shoot this hat, sir, I want him to understand that I'm also postmaster."

"You are!"

"Yes, sir, and when any one sneers at my clothes, sir, let him remember that I've run for the legislature—the legislature, sir! Ha! blow) and was almost elected! I won't have this undue familiarity, sir! Why no man in my town would dare to call me pard, let alone slapping me on the back! Why, sir (blow) why—but I want this stopped!"

"Yes, sir!"

"I won't put up with it!"

"Yes, sir!"

"I am entitled to respect, sir! Yes (blow), I ha! ha! am, sir!"

"Yes, sir!"

He walked up Jefferson avenue, but had not gone a block when a truckman, who was tossing watermelons to a man on the walk, made a miss, but hit the the $14,000 man in the back with a twenty-pounder, and cried out:

"Where every man shall die." Al Beidhawi
Presenteth how there sate with Solomon
A prince of India, and there passed them by Azrael, Angel of Death, on shadowy plumes;
With great eyes gazing earnestly, as one
Who wonders, gazing. And, because the prince
Sate with the king, he saw what the king saw,
The Djins and Angels, and saw Azrael
Fixing on him those awful searching eyes.
"What name, I pray thee, wears you messenger?"
So asked he of the king, and Solomon
Made answer, "It is Azrael, who calls
The souls of men." "He seemed," whispered the prince,
"To have an errand unto me; bid now
That one among thy demon ministers
Waft me, upon the swiftest wing that beats,
To India, for I fear him." Solomon
Issued command, and a swift Djin sprang forth
Bearing the prince aloft, so that he came
To Coromandel ere the fruit—which fell
Out of the fig—had touched the marble floor.
Thereupon Azrael said to Solomon,
"I looked thus earnestly upon the man
In wonder, for my Lord spake, 'Take his soul
In India;' yet behold he talked with thee
Here in Judæa! Now, see, he hath gone
There where it was commanded he should die."

Then followed Azrael. In that hour the prince
Died of a hurt, sitting in India.

CLOCK WORK.

"My! no!" said Mrs. Poysett, laughing at the very idea; "we ain't afraid to stay in the house one night 'thout men-folks. Be we, Lindy?"

"I guess not," said black-eyed Linda, cheerily, washing her hands as a preliminary to putting the bread in the pans.

"Frank says, when John wrote him to come and stay a day over in Boston: 'You'll be afraid, mother, with all Lindy's presents in the house.' And he was real put out at first because I wouldn't have some of the neighbors come in to sleep."

"Well, I don't blame you, ef you feel's ef you could sleep—on'y two women folks," said the caller, sharp-featured Miss Haines, with prominent elbows and emphatically-clean calico. "It 'ud on'y amount to makin' up a bed for nuthin'."

"Yes," Mrs. Poysett went on, accompanying the slicing of apples for pies with the regular swing of her rocking chair, while she now and then placed a particularly thin and inviting piece of the fruit in her mouth, "that's what I thought. Ten—'leven—Lindy, when you go into the other room, I wish you'd strike that clock round. It strikes one too many."

"Yes'm," said brisk Linda; and then, trying to extricate the recipe for composition cake from inevitable dreams about her wedding day, she forgot the clock—and made an incident for his story.

"Your presents are handsome, Lindy; there's no mistake about that," said the visitor, turning the conversation skillfully to the quarter toward which the town interest was just then tending.

"Yes," answered Linda, blushing a little. She had grown used to blushing of late. "People have been very kind to me."

"No more'n you deserve," said Miss Haines, oracularly, and with an emphasis that left no room for denial. "Folks say to me, 'John Willey's been pretty stiddy to go out West and make a home, 'n' then come back 'n' marry the girl he's been with ever sence they was child'en.' But I say to 'em, 'No credit to him. No more'n he'd orter done. Lindy's pure gold, and he's got the sense to see it.'" And she finished her eulogy on the doorstep, perhaps to avoid having the matter disputed, while Linda went back to her cooking table, laughing, and still gratefully rosy over the sense that everybody in general was far too good to her. It was a case of the smooth running of deep waters. She and John Willey had been prosaically faithful to each other for years before he asked her promise to marry him. Eighteen months ago he had gone West to set up in business as a carriage builder, and now, having prospered, was coming East for his wife. Within two days' journey of home he had written to ask Frank, Linda's brother, to meet him in Boston for a day's sight-seeing and an evening at the theater. Perhaps you would say that the ideal lover should have hastened to his lady on the wings of the wind, or with all the power of steam; but Linda thought differently.

"It was just like him—wasn't it, mother?"—she said that very morning, after Miss Haines had gone, "to think Frank would be the better for a change. I'd rather have him go to Boston for a good time than see John one day sooner. And I'm sure nobody could speak stronger than that, could they, mother?"

"I don't know what I shall do without you, Lindy," said the mother, rather irrelevantly, putting down the knife to wipe away a furtive tear with her apron. "I'm sure I don't know."

Linda was at her side in an instant, with a tear of her own, and the two women kissed, laughed, and went on with their work, as they had done a hundred times within the last fortnight. For Mrs. Poysett had the equable temperament that sometimes accompanies rotundity of form and a double chin, and Linda, besides being sensible, could not keep miserable very long at a time. Thus you perceive that circumstances were rendering it as easy as possible for them to weather the gale of coming separation.

Meanwhile, everybody in the township was not rotund and possessed of double chins, not all the houses were keepers of new and shining wedding-gifts, and, strange to say, not everybody was happy. Pete Haydon, who lived down in pan lane, was poor and savagely discouraged. He made shoes ordinarily, but that winter there were no shoes to be had. His was a fine and practiced hand; he could do all sorts of jobs, from cleaning a watch to building a chimney, but nobody saw fit to have making or mending done. There had only been four or five pieces of work since fall for Tinker Pete, for none of which could he in conscience ask more than fifteen cents. His wife fell sick, the children's clothes were too shabby for school, and just then some one tapped him on the arm and tempted him.

One morning a stranger strolled into town and stopped at Pete's little shop to ask his way. He was traveling to Southfield, so he said.

"Where had he been?"

"Oh, anywhere," airily and jauntily; "traveling about the country. Might take up with work somewhere, if I found any worth doing."

"Hard times," said Pete, looking moodily at the little red stove. "What's your trade?"

"I've been a sailor," said the man, filling his pipe—a process Pete watched greedily, for his own tobacco box was empty. "Twenty years before the mast. I should have been a captain before this time—but there's jealousies. So I got sick of it. I call myself a landsman now."

"You don't have the look of a sailor," said Pete, his eyes traveling from the shabby fur cap and the dark face with rather narrow, bold black eyes down over the shabby suit of brown.

The man gave a slight start and glanced at him keenly. "You don't think so? Well, I've been on land some time now. Salt water's easy to shake off. What might your name be?"

"Haydon—Pete Haydon."

"And mine's Job Whettles. Queer name, ain't it? Don't believe there's another like it in the country. Good day, mate. If I'm round this way again I'll look in on you."

And he did.

One day, as Pete was soldering a milk-pail for Mrs. Burge, this time whistling a little, having work to whistle over, the man came in without warning of rap or voice.

"Thought you's twenty-five mile away afore this," said Pete, plying his iron. "Take a seat."

"Things don't please me much over that way," said the fellow, pompously, again beginning to cut his tobacco, perhaps as a cover to his furtive glances. "I may stay round here a spell. Perhaps I'll do a bit of work on somebody's farm."

"Can't get it," said Pete, briefly, viewing his completed job with approval. "Ain't no farm work to be had just now."

"Well, doing chores, I mean—light work. I'm not particular how little I do for my board," with a coarse laugh.

"Folks do their own work round here," said Pete. "Some of 'em have got money enough to pay, but they're able-bodied, as it happens, and don't want a hired man round in the winter."

"Seems a pity—don't it?—that things can't be equally divided, so that you and I could have our share," said the stranger, puffing industriously at his pipe, but not forgetting to watch the tinker. "I should like to help myself to somebody's pile; now, shouldn't you? Honestly enough, of course, man. You needn't jump. I mean, suppose the young fellow that owns the big farm over there—Poysett—should say, 'Whettles, take half my bank stock. I don't need it all;' do you think I should say 'no'?"

Of course the tinker laughed at the fanciful notion. He was a sunny-tempered fellow; it hardly needed a very bright thing to provoke his mirth.

Where Whettles stayed at night was a mystery. Sometimes Pete suspected he might have slept in a barn, he turned up so tousled in the morning; often he guessed that Toppan, the saloon keeper, had given him a lodging, from the fumes that lingered about his shabby person. He had money at times, for again and again he treated Pete to a cheering glass of whisky. Pete was not used to frequenting the saloon; he did not in the least approve of it; but it happened that about this time this evil bird of prey sought his company more persistently than did any more respectable person. And Whettles was a sociable fellow; he could tell more stories in half an hour than any six of the honest people Pete knew taken together. He was, so Pete concluded, nobody's enemy but his own. It would take more time than you are willing to give, and a deeper knowledge of mental intricacies than I possess, to detail the process through which Pete was brought to the point of promising to creep into the Poysett farm house and rifle the old desk that stood between the sitting-room windows. The grocer's bill was growing longer, his wife was paler, and she worried him by entreaties to let Whettles alone and forsake Toppan's; the aggregate of such straws is not small.

The opportunity came, fitting the mood as exactly as if the mood had made it. Frank Poysett was going to Boston to meet John Willey; the "women folks" would be alone.

"You take Poysett's," said Whettles; "you know the lay of the land there; and the same night I'll try Turner's, over on the hill. We'll meet somewhere about 1, down there under the big elm, and divide. After that I'll make tracks across lots and take a train somewhere; nobody'll think of you."

Tinker Pete was equally sure of nobody suspecting him. He had always been honest—this he thought with a pause—and, being a simple-minded sort of fellow, he never calculated the effect in other people's eyes of having been seen with Whettles.

"But s'pose my courage gives out," he said uncertainly. "I don't know's I can do it, after all. It's easy enough to get in, but what if somebody should see me?" It might end in what's worse."

"Man alive!" said Whettles, impatiently. "Afraid at your time of life? Well, here's what I'll do. They go to bed early; you can have it over by midnight. Now, I'll come back that way, and if you're there and afraid to stir, I'll go in and do it myself. But, mind, I don't expect you're going to back out. If I have to do all the work, I get all the pay."

"Oh, I mean to do it fast enough," said Pete, doggedly. "Things can't be much worse off than they are now."

"And if I ain't there by 12, you'll know somethin's happened and I can't come; so you'll have to go on your own hook. But be sure you're at the big tree by 1."

Whettles, like many another skillful tactician, did not tell his catspaw all his plans. He had no intention of doing what might be done for him. It was only politic to assure Pete of helping him out should his courage fail for fear, under too great dread, that he might break away from the plan altogether. Whettles, who had as little right to this name as to many another article he had possessed at various times, was as truly an arrant coward as a villain. All his ill deeds, and they were numerous, had been done, as far as he could manage it, at the expense of somebody else. If the robbery at Turner's seemed feasible without too much danger, he would keep his word; if not, there was at hand the excuse of having been watched or prevented, and Pete could be coaxed or treated into sharing what spoil he had from the Poysetts'.

That evening Mrs. Poysett and Linda had an early tea, and, having done the in-door work, sat down for one of the quiet talks that had grown so precious because they were so soon to cease. The journey to Illinois was so long, and Linda's beginning a new life such a serious matter, that it seemed the two would never have done talking it all over. Henry, the nearest neighbor's boy, had shut up the barn long ago, the milk was strained, and the pails were washed.

"I've laid out a dozen o' them coarse crash towels for your dishes, Lindy," said Mrs. Poysett. "Yes, I know you've got a lot o' new ones; but you can't have too many o' such things. There ain't any such thing as bein' extravagant about keepin' your dishes clean and shiny. Your grandmother Poysett used to say she believed I'd like a clean towel to every cup. Lindy, how glad I am that you ain't got to live with a mother-in-law!" A husky sigh of relief was here Mrs. Poysett's tribute to the memory of the woman who had made the first ten years of her married life a discipline.

"To think John and Frank will be here tomorrow night at 7 o'clock!" said Linda dreamily. "We'll have quince for supper, won't we, Mother?"

"Yes; and I guess we'd better be abed just as early as we can get there. You be fastenin' up, and I'll wind the clock." Mrs. Poysett did that in the dark, for Linda had taken the lamp into the kitchen. "Eight! Well, I declare," said the good lady as the clock struck after she had groped her way up stairs. "And it's right, too; for Lidy put it round this mornin'. Seems to me it took you a good while," she went on, as Linda came in with the lamp. "I don't b'lieve but what you went through some extra fastenin' up, now we're alone."

"Not a bit, mother," said Linda, with a smile cut short by a yawn. "I stopped to put the cat out."

"I always think of what your father said," mused the old lady. "It was after the Hampstead murder. We never'd had our doors fastened in the world till then, and as soon as news of that come, everybody was scared to death, and your father put a button on the back door. And the first night he turned it, he laid awhile thinkin', and then says he, 'If there's only a wooden button between me and death, I guess I'll trust in the Lord and not the button.' So he went down stairs and turned it back again. What a lot of hair you have got, Lindy, and how quick you braid it!"

When Pete crept up to the house at 10, the women had been soundly asleep for two hours. He tried the kitchen window; it had no fastening, and went up noiselessly. He stepped in and stood trembling. The clock in the next room ticked with appalling loudness. His knees smote together, but it required as much courage now to flee as to remain. Perhaps for ten minutes—perhaps hours, judging by his own exaggerated reckoning—he stood in fear: and then, as the clock ticked on steadily as if it had no reference to him, his heart-beats grew fainter and his courage crawled back.

He crept toward the sitting-room door on his hands and knees. There stood the old desk, with its high spindle-legs, half of it an exaggerated shadow and half thrown into light by a shaft from the moon. Probably the key was in the lock. He had seen it there himself a dozen times—had seen Frank bring in a fat roll of bills after selling his oxen, toss them in there and put down the cover without turning the key. There had been no robberies in Belburn, and so people trusted more in human nature and less in steel and wood. But the sitting-room was so light! He should never dare go in there; the very thought of having his shadow thrown on the wall, distorted like those of the tables and chairs, gave him another sickening spasm of fear. What if there were only women in the house? Suppose one appeared? where should he hide himself? He was not a thief by nature or training. He would crouch down in a corner and wait for Whettles. He had been there ages, when the clock gave warning; ages longer, and with an alarming preliminary whir it struck twelve. He started up with an after-impulse of gratitude that he had not shrieked. When had the hour before struck? It seemed incredible that he could have slept, but it must have been so, or, what was more probable, he had been too absorbed to hear it. It was time for Whettles. He crept back to the kitchen window and waited in the cold draught of air. Minutes passed, each seeming ten. He began to grow angry. Did the fellow mean to play him false and not come at all? As anger rose, his courage to do the deed ebbed. I do not believe conscience asserted itself very strongly. Life was harder than it had been even one day before, and there was no flour in the house now. He was still bitterly at odds with life, but the after-effects of the whisky Whettles had had given him were nervousness and irresolution. The clock gave warning for another hour. False, friendly old clock, if he could have seen your face he would have known it looked ten minutes of midnight then; instead, he believed it would strike one. Too late for Whettles. Perhaps he was now at the old elm; he would hurry there and bring him back to do his share of the work. He closed the window behind him and hurried off to the rendezvous. There was no one there. At that moment the relief of having been prevented from sin overbalanced every other feeling. Something must have happened to Whettles; perhaps he had been caught; perhaps he would say that his accomplice was waiting for him under the elm! He started on a swift run for home, to find his wife waiting for him in the moonlight.

She was too thankful at finding him sober to worry at the lateness of his coming. Being a woman of tact, she did not question, but went to sleep, while Pete lay till daybreak in a cold bath of fear, expecting a rap and summons to jail at every tapping of bough or snapping of frost-bitten nail.

Whettles had lingered about Turner's, a great house over the hill, in the hope that the guests—for there was a party that night—would take their leave. But no; the house was lighted from chambers to parlor, and sleighs came instead of going away. He walked up and down in the orchard, cursing himself to keep warm. Later and later, and the singing and dancing of shadows on the curtains did not cease. He would hurry over to the Poysetts' and see if the cats paw had done his work there. He stole up to the designated window, as Pete had done. No one was there. He listened, and whistled softly. The clock struck 1. He had no idea it was so late. Pete must be waiting for him at the elm. And so he, too, hurried away.

But it was only a mammoth lace-work of shadow under the elm. Where was Pete? The master villain, himself puzzled, reflected a moment. Perhaps the fellow had the money and was himself hiding it at home. Lucky thought! He would go to the house and call him up, in spite of disturbing wife and children. Then if he should refuse to share! He took the road, and, passing Toppan's saloon, noticed a dim light in the bar-room. It was rather unusual that it should be there so late, but he had known it to happen before. He had just about money enough for a dram. He tapped, and then tried the door; it was unfastened, and he went in lightly. A man in a great-coat rose from his seat by the stove and swiftly, dextrously pinioned him. Toppan, himself, always on the winning side, was there ready to help, and Whettles was arrested for his last crime.

Mrs. Poysett and Linda were afoot early the next morning, putting the house in holiday trim.

"I declare if 'tain't an hour earlier 'n I thought," said Mrs. Poysett as she came down into the sitting room, where the little air-tight was already doing its ardent best. "Lindy, you didn't strike that clock 'round yesterday, after all."

"No, mother; I forgot it," laughed Linda. "I should forget my head, nowadays, if 'twasn't fastened on."

"I'll tell you what it is," said the mother, beginning to spread the breakfast-table, "I'm just about out o' patience with that clock, strikin' the hours away afore they get here. It seems malicious, tryin' to hurry you off. Now, perhaps its only half a day's job or so; let's send for Tinker Pete and have him come up and fix it."

So the chore-boy was dispatched for Pete. He came like a culprit, uncertain whether the message was feigned to cover suspicion of him or not. But no one could look into Mrs. Poysett's clear eyes for a moment, or hear Linda's laugh, with even a lingering fear that either had anything to conceal. When they described the clock's malady, I am inclined to think Pete was as near being faint with surprise as ever man was in his life, and I think he touched the worn old clock-case reverently, thanking it for keeping his deeds honest, however he had sinned in thought. He stayed to dinner, and Mrs. Poysett put up a pail of goodies for the children. On his way home he heard the news: Whettles had been arrested and taken away on an early train. Again he walked in fear and trembling; his hair grew used to standing on end in those days. He expected an interview with Nemesis concerning his intended crime, but, whether justly or unjustly, Nemesis stayed away.

The wedding? It was a very quiet one, and the happy pair went away next morning, followed by blessings and old shoes. Frank had had such an extravagantly good time in Boston that he felt he could only counterbalance it by plunging into work deeper than ever. So he began cutting the timber in the old wood lot, and hired Tinker Pete to chop there every day till spring.

"GRAN'MA AL'A'S DOES."

I want to mend my wagon,
And has to have some nails;
Just two, free will be plenty—
We're going to haul our rails!
The splendidest cob fences
We're makin' ever was!
I wis' you'd help us find 'em—
Gran'ma al'a's does.

My horse's name is Betsey;
She jump'd and broked her head;
I put her in the stable
And fed her milk and bread.
The stable's in the parlor—
We didn't make no muss;
I wis' you let it stay there—
Gran'ma al'a's does.

I's goin' to the cornfield,
To ride on Charley's plough;
I 'spect he'd like to have me,
I wants to go just now.
Oh, won't I gee up awful,
And whoa like Charley whoas
I wis' you wouldn't bozzer—
Gran'ma never does.

I wants some bread and butter;
I's hungry worstest kind;
But Taddie mustn't have none,
'Cause she wouldn't mind.
Put plenty sugar on it;
I tell you what, I knows
It's right to put on sugar—
Gran'ma al'a's does.

FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

The Two Little Teachers.

Louis was eating his breakfast cakes one morning, when mother went to the door to see about the milk.

"Louis," she said, as she came in, "I saw a model of the suspension bridge out on the end of the front porch."

Louis had seen the Brooklyn bridge, when he was in New York, and the workmen far up and out among the wires, looking like spiders in a web, and he had quite a curiosity to see the model of such a structure. So, of course, he ran out, and papa walked along, too, to have a look at the long spider's web stretched from one post to the other, holding a drop of moisture from the fog in the center.

"That was what suggested the suspension bridge to Sir Samuel Brown," said mother, as they sat down again at table. "He was walking along his garden path one dewy morning, just like this, studying how to build a cheap bridge across the Tweed. Right across his path, as if to stop his progress, hung a little spider's rope, heavy with dew. 'Why not make a bridge like that, and hang it on ropes or chains?' he thought. The more he studied it over the plainer grew the plan, and so suspension bridges were invented, and have become such a great success. The little spider was the teacher God sent to give a lesson to the great engineer."

"Another great inventor," said papa, "learned a lesson from an insect not half so sharp as the spider. It was the poor, little ship worm that taught Sir I. Brunel how to build his Thames tunnel. He saw how the little creature, with his shield upon his head, perforated the hard wood, now in this direction and now in that, and when his track was made he covered all the sides with a kind of varnish. Copying his work on a large scale, he built a shield, under which he was able to dig into the earth under the river, and so his great tunnel was built."

Papa took from a cabinet in the room a bit of ship's timber that had been riddled by this little borer, and showed it to Louis, and pointed out the fact that however close the walls lay to each other, they never ran into each other. It was quite a little lesson in philosophy for a seven-year-old, but the web and the specimen helped to impress it quite deeply on his memory. When he saw a spider's rope bridge ever after, he would be quite apt to think of the valuable invention which it once suggested.

A Brave Chinese Baby.

He was little more than a baby, certainly not more than three or four years old; and the queer wide clothes he wore made him look so short, at first sight, it seemed a miracle he could walk at all. He was all alone in the house; in fact he was all alone in the village. Every other house but his was shut up tight, the door locked, and all the people gone away fishing. What a predicament, to be sure, for a four-year-old boy to be left in! The more I think of it, the more I think he was one of the very bravest fellows ever born. Many a man has got a great name for being a hero without having shown half the courage that this little chap did when he toddled into the street to meet us.

It was a Chinese fishing village, on the shore of the Pacific ocean, a few miles from Monterey, in California. There are several such villages on that coast, and, to Americans, they are very curious places to see.

The door of the brave baby's house stood wide open, and, as soon as he heard the sound of our carriage wheels, he came running to see what was coming. We stopped the carriage and got out. He looked at us for a minute with a steady gaze, then turned around, and waddled back as fast as his fat little legs would carry him into the dark recesses of his house. We thought he had run away to hide. Not a bit of it. In a few seconds, back he came, holding up to us a big abalone shell, tightly grasped in both his chubby hands; then he laid it on a bench by the door, waddled back, got another, brought it out and laid it down; then still another.

In all the houses in the fishing villages there are great baskets of these abalone shells kept to sell to travelers, and the baby had, no doubt, often seen his mother bring them out and offer them to people passing by. So he thought they might be what we had come for. As he held out shell after shell toward us, he fixed his queer, narrow, slanting little eyes on us with an expression of anxiety and inquiry that was pathetic. When he saw that we did not want the shells, he went back again, still farther into the recesses of the cabin, and, bringing out a tin dipper with a little water in it, offered that to us.

AFFINITY.

"The air is vibrant with subtle essence
Of some etherial, permeating presence—
Till though beyond my visual beholding
I'm fully conscious of its sweet enfolding!

My willing spirit yields to the enthralment,
Unconscious wholly whence the influence streams—
And prays kind heaven may send a second installment,
Though fleeting as the gossamer of dreams!

Exuberant nature's generously exhaling
Her inner life in aromatic vales,
Till in the ecstacy of its inhaling
The sweetest antecedent memory pales!

With receptivity my spirit lingers
'Mid the enchantments of these glad aboundings,
And with its covetous, outstretched, grasping fingers
Seeks perpetuity for its surroundings.

But, as the roseiest dawn must fade away
Before the prosy brilliancy of the day,
So all these hazy, idealistic dreams
Give place to life's more realistic schemes.

And, logically searching, I soon find
What caused my sweet deliriousness of mind—
'Twas Cupid—who, conspiring with my wife,
Touched love's nerve center and thrilled through my life.

CARRADINE'S LOVE.

Carradine sat alone at his easel, painting; and as he painted he thought. Eight years before, when he was a poor struggling boy, just entering on that race which must be run by every aspirant to art and its honors, there happened to him something which neither time nor toil had ever been able to efface from his memory. As he was passing along the streets a wreath of fragrant roses suddenly fell on his head, and looking up in wonder, he beheld, reaching out from the embroidered draperies of an overhanging window, a child, with fairy-like proportions, with great dark eyes and long, curling black locks, who stood smiling and throwing him kisses from her curved lips, colored like a pomegranate. While she still gazed, a nurse had come forward and drawn the child away; the curtains were closed, and he saw the little creature no more. Such was the vision that the artist had carried so long in his memory; in his memory only, for he had no second glimpse of the child. That very day an accident occurred which kept him a prisoner in his room for several weeks, and when next he went out the house was empty, and a placard with great flaring letters announcing it for sale stared him in the face, from the same window in which the little white-robed elf had stood waving her hand and smiling to him. In course of time other faces appeared there, but they were strange faces, and among them was never the one for which he looked.

Now, as Carradine sat painting alone, he thought of all this; of the struggle that had ended at length in success; of his hard, unfriended boyhood, and of the beautiful child with her fragrant rose crown, which had seemed almost like a prophecy. That rose wreath, dry and withered now, was all that was left to him of the fair vision; but when that morning, in turning over an old portfolio, he had come upon it by chance, it spoke to him of that by-gone day just as eloquently as when its blossoms were fresh and full.

"Eight years ago," he said, thoughtfully, letting the shriveled circlet slip through his fingers slowly. "She must be sixteen now—if she lives. If? No, I do not doubt her living presence—somewhere. I wonder where she is now, and what she is like at sixteen?"

With that he placed the wreath beside his easel, and began to paint. The face, as it grew on his canvas, presented a young girl in the dewy morning blush of first youth, with shadows in the great dark eyes and a half smile about the bright curled lips, like an embodied summer sun shower. It was thus that the artist pictured his ideal of the child woman, whose infantile look and smile for eight long years had been his own dream of love.

Carradine had not had an easy life. An orphan from his earliest years, poor and unfriended, he had studied hard for the means to gratify that inherent idolatry for art which was always clamoring to find expression in form and coloring. He had fought and he had won; but now, at twenty-six, he stood in the place which he had gained for himself almost as much alone at the very heart as he had been eight years before, when the child's gift came to him as a prophecy.

It was not that he was friendless. There were men who liked and sought him, women who would gladly have taught him to forget his loneliness in their affection. But though his nature responded rapidly to any kindness, there was one chord, deeper than all, that remained untouched, and from the sweetest glances his thoughts went back to the unknown child that had smiled down on him so long ago.

The ideal head became his great source of enjoyment, and a dreamy softness shaded his dark-grey eyes, as line by line and tint by tint took him back into that past, which, all lifeless as it was, seemed to him, in those moments, more real than the busy present. Yet now, in reviewing that one bright vision of his memory, it was not so much the lovely child that he saw in fancy, as the beautiful girl whose face, with fuller depth and sweetness, looked out at him from his own canvas.

Instinctively, he hardly knew why, he disliked to work on this picture in any other presence, and he devoted to it only his hours of solitude. So it happened that it was nearly finished when by some chance, a friend discovered him bending over it, too absorbed to hear any approach. As the door opened, Carradine rose hastily, turning his easel to the wall, so as to conceal the face upon it. This little stratagem, however, was destined to be of no avail. Having been marked by the intruder, one of those cordial, well meaning people, good natured to a degree, but with little delicacy of perception—the action at once aroused his curiosity.

"Aha, master painter," he said, with a laugh, "let us see what it is that you work at by yourself till it steals away your eyes and ears. Only one peep!"

With that, he laid his hand on the frame, and receiving no forbidding word from Carradine, turned it around. The next moment he was loud in praise.

"But who is it, Carradine? If it is a portrait, tell me where to find the original, and I will, if it is a seven days' journey!"

Carradine smiled.

"If I myself knew where to find such an original I should not be here to tell you, my good friend," he answered evasively.

"Oh, a fancy sketch," said the other, misled, as the artist had desired. "I might have saved myself the trouble of asking. No real flesh and blood face ever looked like that—more shame to nature, I say. Of course you will exhibit it, Carradine?"

"No!" answered the painter, quietly.

"No!" repeated the other in surprise. "But my dear fellow, you must, or I shall betray your secret, and you will have a swarm of visitors, worse than a plague of Egypt, let in upon you."

Carradine hesitated. A chance word in his friend's speech had suggested a possibility that made his heart leap in spite of sober reason.

"You are right," he said. "I shall send the picture for exhibition. It will be better so."

After his visitor had left him alone again, Carradine bent low over his easel, gazing into the lovely, upturned face, until it began to fade into the gathering twilight.

"It—it!" he murmured to himself, half unconsciously. "But it cannot be. Yet I will send it—and perhaps——"

And so the picture was sent, in due time; and it seemed almost as if Carradine's soul had gone with it and drawn him to follow. Hour after hour, and day after day, he sat in the gallery, scrutinizing eagerly every face amid the visitors, whom taste or fashion had brought to look at the now celebrated artist's latest success. Every night he went away unsatisfied, and every morning he returned with hope springing afresh in his heart.

Still, the object of his search, whatever it may have been, does not appear; and one day, discouraged at last, he resolved to go no more on so fruitless an errand. Shutting himself in his studio, he began to paint, but, strive as he would, he could command neither hand nor fancy. Finally, tired of repeated failure, he abandoned work, and yielded to an impulse which drew his steps in the customary direction.

When he entered the small side room in which his picture hung, he found but two persons within, a young man and a girl.

Carradine could not see the faces of these two, but, with an earnestness for which he was at a loss to account, he followed their retreating figures as they moved slowly toward his picture. But the next moment an exclamation of astonishment burst from the lips of the young man.

"Why, here is your portrait, Leilia! What does it mean? Who can the painter be?"

With that he hurried out to purchase a catalogue. Carradine advanced quickly to the girl.

"I am the painter," he said.

She turned and looked at him with one steady gaze from those glorious eyes that had haunted his visions for so many years. Then she spoke:

"You painted that picture? and how?"

"From remembrance," he answered. "It is my only tribute to the little unknown princess who crowned me o[illegible]th roses. Does she, too, remember it?"

For a moment doubt was in her face; but as he looked fixedly at her it vanished in certainty. A smile just touched her bright lips.

"It was you, then, on whom I forced my roses? A princess who gave away honors unasked. How often I have wondered since—"

She stopped, turned to the canvas, and added abruptly, "but I was a child then, and here—"

"Here you are a woman," said Carradine, completing the unspoken sentence. "It is so hard to understand? The same power that kept the child in my heart showed me into what she would ripen."

She did not look at him now, but at the picture, as she asked him in a low voice, "and whom am I to thank for such an honor?"

"My name is Hubert Carradine," he answered, and saw at once that it was no unfamiliar word to her. "And yours? Through all these years your face has haunted me always, but your name I never knew."

She hesitated a moment, then turned to him.

"You never knew my name? Then think of me still as you have thought of me through all these years," she said, a half smile lingering about her mouth, but never lighting the great dark that was shaded by some subtle sadness. The look, the tone, transported Carradine beyond all remembrance of place or circumstance, into the unreal realm of imagination in which his wish was supreme ruler.

"I have thought of you always as my life and my love," he said, half consciously, his dreamy, deep gray eyes glowing upon her face. She blushed suddenly, and then paled in an instant. Just then her former companion entered the room.

"I am Leilia Auvernay," she said hastily, "and this is Cecil Wyndham, my—my betrothed husband."

Not another word was said. As the young man approached Carradine fell back a step and looked at the two. His was a fair, handsome face, so little marked as yet by time, that it would be hard for an unpracticed eye to conjecture with what lines the shaping character would yet stamp it. Nevertheless, with one keen gaze Carradine estimated both present and future.

She said a few low, spoken words to her companion, who presently moved toward Carradine, and addressed him:

"I have the honor of speaking to Mr. Carradine, the painter of this picture?"

Carradine bowed without speaking.

"Will you pardon me for asking if it is a fancy sketch?" continued Mr. Wyndham.

"Partly so, but suggested by the face of a little girl," answered the artist.

"But the likeness is so very striking," muttered the young gentleman. "I must have it at any rate. Of course you will part with it—at your own price?"

"The picture is not for sale," said Carradine, quietly, still regarding the young man with that cool, steady gaze which had already caused him to betray a hesitation, almost confusion, very unlike his usual easy confidence. He seemed to have an instinctive knowledge that the artist was measuring him, and to shrink from that measurement with unconscious dread.

Carradine saw Leilia Auvernay once more before she returned to her home in a distant town. Then he took his picture from the academy walls and hung it in his studio, where his eyes could find it whenever he looked away from his work. For he did not give up work; yet, among themselves, his friends pronounced him an altered man, and marveled what had caused so subtle a difference. Always silent, he now seemed to live in an ideal world of his own; and, whatever he might occupy himself with, there was that in his manner which appeared to imply that it was only a temporary diversion until the coming of some event for which he was waiting.

So passed half a year, at the end of which there came a letter to Carradine. It was very brief, but it was enough to assure him of that which he had been almost unconsciously expecting.

The letter was from Leilia Auvernay. He went to her at once. She met him with a laughing light in her eyes such as he had not seen there when she stood in the gallery beside her betrothed husband; a light which recalled the merry child who had smiled down on him so long ago.

"Mr. Carradine," she said, "I told you that my fortune was gone, but I did not tell you how utterly it had been swept away. I am nothing better than a beggar. Will you take me for one of your students, for charity's sake?"

He looked searchingly into her smiling face.

"And Mr. Wyndham?" he asked, in a low voice.

She laughed without so much as a flush of emotion.

"Mr. Wyndham has gone with the rest of my worldly possessions. Did I not say that I had lost everything? You see, Mr. Carradine, that I am not of as much worth now as my picture."

The words, as she said them, did not seem bitter. He took her hands.

"Leilia," he said, "does your loss make you unhappy?"

"Do I look so?" she asked, gayly. "As for the marriage, it was my father's wish, and to gratify his dying request I consented—before I knew my own heart——." Here, a quick, vivid color shot into her cheek, but she went on: "There never was love on my side; and on his—well, money is more than love—with some natures. I do not wish to blame him."

Carradine's grasp tightened on her hands.

"Leilia," he said, "once your answer put a bar between us when I spoke words that were surprised out of my heart. Would it be so now, if I should say them once more? My love, my life, will you come to me?"

"Will I come!" she repeated, looking up in his eyes and drawing nearer, until his arms silently folded about her.

A Homestead Decision.

Washington Dispatch to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat: In the case of the homestead entry of Mrs. Graham on lands claimed by the Hastings & Dakota railway, the commissioner of the general land office has awarded the land to the former. The case has been taken up on appeal and is now before the secretary. It is understood that the decision has already been written and is favorable to the settler and against the railroad company. The attorneys for the road have asked for a delay of the decision to produce an additional argument. A law was passed during the war allowing a man in the army to make an entry while in the service, with the idea that the land should be occupied by some member of his family. In 1866 the entry in question was made, while Graham was in the service. The grant to the road was also made in 1866. The company claim that as the land had never been occupied by any member of the Graham family at that time the land would inure to the grant. It is held, on the other hand, that the filing being legal, and upon the face of it fair, it took the land from the operations of the grant. The case has been called up by Mr. Strait at different times, and he has endeavored to secure an early decision. He says he is for the settler every time.

Another Report of Arthur's Engagement.

New York Truth publishes a story to the effect that President Arthur has become smitten with the charms of Miss Sackville West, the daughter of the British minister, who is heir presumptive to his brother, Lord Sackville. The paper discusses the event of the marriage, and comments also upon the personal charms of the lady. Miss West is not yet of age, says Truth, but to beauty and grace of person she adds the dignity and presence of a much older woman. Miss West's grandfather was Lord De La Ware, a descendant of Delaware of Edward the Third's time. In the event of the marriage, President Arthur will travel abroad at the end of his term, and perhaps reside permanently at Paris or London. After stating that the stars and stripes and union jack are likely to entwine sensationally in a matrimonial way, Truth goes on to show that the president of the United States is a British subject under British law, and if the president ever resided in England he would by courtesy of the court take precedence with the sovereigns. Miss West is a daughter of a Spanish lady of good family, but reduced fortune, whom the British minister married while at the British legation at Madrid. Truth does not say when or where the marriage is likely to take place.

AN OLD MAN'S STORY.

FOR THE PIONEER PRESS.

You were harsh with Jennie to-day, Joe,
And you filled her eyes with tears.
You struck a blow at her heart-strings
That will leave its mark for years.
Yes, men are thoughtless and cruel,
Though strong to lead and control,
And the hands should be tender that fetter
A woman's sensitive soul.

I had passed the romance of youth, Joe,
When I won my fair, young bride,
And my wisdom had quite forgotten
The dreams of life's sweet spring-tide.
I was wrapped in plans for the future,
Winning riches, houses and lands,
And I chilled the joyous creature
Whose fate lay in my hands.

How could I know that her young he
Was building its castles, too?
That the spell of her girlish fancy
Its glamour o'er me threw?
And each word of rebuke I uttered
Struck keen on her wifely pride,
Till the hopes of life's radiant mornin'
Faded and withered and died.

For I had a man's one model,
She must learn my mother's ways.
And all my life I had heard, Joe,
There was naught so harmful as praise.
That the lying breath of flattery,
Spoke in its subtle thrill,
And father and mother looked on, Joe,
While I taught my wife their will.

So a year went by unheeded
And Katie was growing old.
There were tiny lines on her forehead,
That a tale of suff'ring told.
Little I dreamed I had carved them
With my ceaseless words of blame;
That her burden of cheerless labor
Was crushing her slender frame.

One morning, how well I remember.
Something was left undone.
Mother was hurt and offended,
Father was sullen and glum.
I said there was never more quiet
Nor comfort for my life,
And the saddest day in my hist'ry
Was that which made her my wife.

Then up to the field I hastened,
But the day was dismal and chill,
And the lonesome wind of the autumn
Swept keen o'er the crest of the hill.
My heart it was filled with anger
As I turned the sodden loam.
"I will be obeyed," I muttered,
"And master of my home!"

But still as I trod the furrow
I thought of her winsome way,
And the wealth of love she lavishes
On me, so old and gray;
Of the heavy weight of labor
That lay on her shoulders frail,
How her eyes were sad and hopeless
And her cheek was thin and pale.

The blackbirds chanted above me
A requiem in the trees,
And a breath of dim foreboding
Came shivering on the breeze.
And at last my heart relented;
Yielding to love's fond way
I left my plow in the furrow
And homeward went my way.

"Katie!" I called in the kitchen,
And "Katie" I called in the hall,
But a cricket chirped in answer
Slowly, and that was all—
Only the pipe of a blackbird
And the solemn caw of a crow
And the scream of a locomotive
In the village down below.

Across the field I hastened
With echoing anxious cry
When caught on a flaunting briar
A fragment smote my eye.
Only a dainty ribbon
Which had bound a golden tre -
A bit of snow-white ribbon
And a scrap of crimson dress.

Then a presence stood beside me
And chilled my very breath,
Numbing my throbbing pulses,
For the presence it was Death!
Blindly its lead I followed,
In my heart one fierce, mad prayer
As a puff of pearly vapor
Rose up in the murky air.

She stood where the rocks loomed
Over the rack below,
Her clasped hands raised to heaven.
Her blue eyes wild with woe.
Trembling, sinking, swaying,
I heard her frenzied cry,
And I caught her to my bosom
As the train went thundering by.

Oh! wondrous love of woman,
Undimmed by sorrow or pain,
Ready to ope death's portals
To free me from my chains.
Clasped in my arms, I bore her
Back to our home, forlorn,
And there, in the hush of twilight,
Our little child was born.

God reigns! In this far, dim future,
Perhaps there is peace for me.
Her face all tender, forgiving,
In heaven, at last, I may see.
Through years of lonely waiting
I reap what I have sown.
Yes, Joe; 'tis your mother's story,
Whose life paid for your own.

SARAH D. HOBART.

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

An Afternoon in the Boston Cooking School.

BOSTON, Jan. 15.—I arrived at the door of No. 158½ Tremont street at the hour of the lecture on Thursday afternoon, climbed several flights of stairs—in Boston everything is up several flights—paid the admission fee of 50 cents, and took a seat in the "kitchen." It is a long, narrow room, a platform at one end, raised, on which the visitors sit in chairs. Below is a long table, around which some of the ladies can sit, and on which Mrs. Lincoln works before the class. At the other end of the room is a small stove, several cupboards, tables, a sink with hot and cold water, etc. Two or three assistants were there to wait upon Mrs. Lincoln and help her in cooking the various dishes. the doors of the room are painted in a pretty drab color, and the panels a dark reddish brown, on which are painted flowers—a calla lily on one; narcissus, daisies, wheat, etc., on others. Mrs. Lincoln appeared when the room was filled with some forty ladies. She is a pleasant-faced, sweet-voiced woman of medium height and size, with an air of cozy "homeness" about her that at once makes you feel at home in her kitchen. She was enveloped in a huge apron that covered her whole dress, and had sleeves. Her head was adorned with a dainty cap, made of a fancy handkerchief, skillfully "puckered" to form a head-dress. She moved about her work in an easy, assured manner, and soon signified, by ringing a bell, that the hour for beginning was at hand. She then read the following recipes, copies of which we found in our seats. Reading them one at a time, and working them out before us and cooking them:

Braised Calf's Heart—Wipe and stuff with cracker crumbs, seasoned highly with salt, pepper, thyme and onions, and moistened with melted butter; lard, dredge with salt and pepper; put in a small braising pan, and half cover with brown gravy; bake one hour, or until tender, basting often; serve with sauce made as for any browned gravy, and seasoned with lemon or vinegar and chopped pickles.

Braised Beef—Four to six pounds of beef from the round or face of the rump; trim and tie in shape; rub well with salt, pepper and flour; cut two onions, one-half small carrot, one-half small turnip fine, and fry them till light brown in salt pork fat or drippings; skim them out into the braising pan, then brown the meat all over in the same fat, adding more if needed. Put the meat in the pan, add one quart boiling water, and a tablespoon mixed herbs; cover closely and cook in the oven four hours, basting often (every twenty minutes); turn over after two hours; when tender take up the meat, remove the fat from the gravy, add more salt and pepper, and thicken with flour cooked in butter; cook ten minutes and strain over the meat, or serve with horseradish sauce.

Larded Grouse—Singe, clean, wash, and wipe dry; lard the breast and legs; truss; dredge with salt and pepper; rub with soft butter; dredge with flour; bake in very quick oven twenty minutes if liked rare; thirty if well done; serve hot, with bread sauce; garnish with parsley.

Bread Sauce—Dry and roll one cup of stale bread crumbs; sift; boil the fine crumbs (about one-third cup) with one pint milk and one tablespoon salt, and one-half salt-spoon pepper. Fry the coarse crumbs (two-thirds cup) in a tablespoon hot browned butter, stirring lightly with a fork till they absorb all the butter and are separate. Put the white sauce on the platter and sprinkle the brown crumbs over the grease and sauce.

Horseradish Sauce—Four tablespoonfuls grated horseradish (grate the roots, because when purchased grated it is half turnip) four tablespoonfuls of powdered cracker, half cup cream, one teaspoonful powdered sugar, one teaspoonful salt, half salt-spoon pepper, one teaspoon made mustard, one tablespoon vinegar, or enough to give it a good, sharp taste; mix altogether and heat over hot water—set in the top of the tea-kettle.

Brown Sauce—Melt one tablespoon butter in an omelette pan (or spider); when brown add a tablespoon of flour; when well mixed pour on gradually a half a cup of stock, or hot water, letting it boil until it thickens; season to taste with salt, pepper, one tablespoon chopped cucumber pickles.

An Omelette—One tablespoonful milk to every egg used, and salt and pepper to taste; put your yolks into the bowl in which you are to make it; beat the yolks till thick and lemon colored, and add salt and pepper, then the milk; and beat the whites till stiff and dry (use an egg beater), and cut them carefully into the yolks with your spoon; do not stir them, just barely cover the whites with the yellow; when whites are stiff, let stand a moment, and then run a knife around the dish, and they will pour out in a moment without leaving a bit in the dish; butter just begun to brown in your skillet when you pour your omelette in; when brown on edges it will be brown on the bottom; set your skillet for a moment in the oven to dry the top of the omelette; then remove; run a knife around the sides; with a broad knife turn it lightly over half way; and serve on a hot dish.

I was greatly exercised to know what "braising" and "larding" meant, but was speedily enlightened as the work went on. "Braising" is cooking meat in a tightly covered dish in the oven. The French put coals on top of the cover so that the heat may come from both sides. "Larding" is done with a long "larding needle," threaded with long, thin strips of salt pork, drawn through the meat so that an end is left out on either side. These are trimmed evenly and present a very pretty appearance when taken from the oven, being crisp and brown. We were all given a taste of the various dishes; some that were cooked the same way by the class in the morning, were served to us cold, with the delicious horseradish and brown sauce. The wiser ones, had brought teaspoons to use in tasting, the more foolish virgins had to use their fingers, primitive fashion. the delicious odors which for some time filled the room were a sufficient appetizer, if the sight of Mrs. Lincoln's beautiful dexterity was not enough in itself. I left about 5 o'clock, feeling fully convinced of two things; first, that cooking can be made a "thing of beauty and a joy forever," rather than the tedious, monotonous martyrdom it now so often is; and second, that I would come Saturday to the extra demonstration lecture on bread made without kneading, which Mrs. Lincoln said she considered the best.

Dinner Table Fancies.

To be in thoroughly good form at dinner is the very inflorescence of civilized life. Like many other regulations of social life, dinner table etiquette is arbitrary, but not to know certain things is to argue yourself unknown so far as society life goes. To take soup pushing the spoon from rather than toward yourself; to touch the napkin as little as possible; to accept or decline what is offered instantly and quietly; these and other trifles characterize the well-bred diner-out. The attempts to introduce too much color in dinner table decorations are rather declining. The finest white damask still holds the preference, and the center piece of plush or velvet under the lace is little used now. Fewer flowers, too, are seen, and those in very low forms. The dessert plates come in deep tones in Dresden china, and d'oyley on which the finger bowl rests should be immediately removed with the bowl on reaching the guest. The latest fashion in ice-cream plates is the Bohemian glass in oval form with small handles. Menu cards, hand-painted, hold the preference, but many are seen on tinted cardboard, with engraved vignette in one corner and the date in another.

A Delicious Sandwich.

To make wonderfully appetizing sandwiches proceed in this way: Take equal quantities of the breast of cold boiled chicken and of cold boiled tongue. Chop them very fine: so fine in fact that you cannot distinguish the separate particles. Add a good large half teaspoonful of celery salt, a pinch of cayenne pepper and four tablespoonfuls of Mayonnaise dressing. This quantity of condiments will be enough to season the breast of one large chicken and an equal quantity of tongue. When this is perfectly cold, spread some thin slices of bread with butter and then with this mixture. Do not prepare them till you are about ready to serve them. If you wish to take sandwiches for a lunch when traveling, be careful not to make the dressing quite so moist as you would if they are to be eaten at home. The better way, if you do not object to the trouble, is to put the salad filling in a small glass jar, and spread the sandwiches as you need them.

Kitchen Keramics.

Directions for making mock-turtle soup: Take part of a calf's head, remove the brains, rinse the head in several waters, and then let it soak in cold water for an hour. Prepare four quarts of beef stock, put this in a large soup-kettle, put the head in, and let this cook slowly for an hour and a half. Then take the head out, let it get cold, and then cut all the meat from it and return bones and meat both to the soup. Fry in butter, till brown, a large onion which you have sliced very thin; add this to the soup, with some pieces of carrot, turnip, parsley, if you can obtain it, some celery, and any herbs, such as sage or summer savory, if you like them in soup. The secret of success in making this is to cook it long enough, and it should be cooked slowly. The scum should be skimmed off at an early stage in the preparation of the dish, and the soup must be strained before it is served. One authority on this soup says that a lemon sliced and added to it a few mintes before removing from the fire is an improvement. This soup can be made in a large quantity, as it keeps well, and is thought by some cooks to be better the second or third day. B.

A sense of responsibility may be cultivated in children at an early age, and unless carried to excess, and burdens are laid upon young shoulders that ought not to be borne by them, it is a wise and helpful plan for a mother to pursue. Let the boys learn to take care of their own peculiar property—for instance, let it be their duty to see that when they come in with their skates they are dried and rubbed, if there is any suspicion of rust on them, with a flannel cloth with a little oil on it (kerosene is excellent for this purpose.) This is but one of the many little acts they can perform which will be of benefit to them, and, as a general rule, children who have something to do are happier, and have, as we say, better dispositions than those who are left to follow their own behests entirely.

An oyster omelette may be a new dish to some cooks, and I can assure them that it will be a favorite if the family like oysters. Stew a dozen oysters in their own liquor, if possible, if not, use a very little water; roll two or three lumps of butter the size of butternuts in flour, and put in and let it come to a boil; salt it well and add black or cayenne pepper to suit your taste. Take out the oysters and chop them, and, if necessary to make it thick, add a little flour to the sauce, then put the oysters in, and set the sauce pan in which they are on the back part of the stove. Beat your eggs until very light, and add to them two tablespoonfuls of cream or rich milk; fry in a well-buttered frying-pan. When done, remove to a hot platter or a deep plate, and pour the oyster sauce over it. Serve while hot.

Here is a novel and pleasing way to prepare a dessert. It is especially adapted for the children's birthday dinners in those happy households where such days are kept in joyous festivals. Make a small hole in the end or side of a number of egg shells. Through this pour out the egg. Fill the empty shells with hot pudding made of cornstarch, arrowroot or Irish moss. When cold break off the shells; serve on small saucers, and surround the egg-shaped pudding with jelly or jam. If you wish to take so much trouble, divide the pudding in two parts, and add to one a tablespoonful of grated chocolate, and in this way color part of the eggs. Sugar and cream, flavored with vanilla, is a very nice sauce with this kind of pudding.

A good breakfast dish can be prepared from the remains of yesterday's dinner, providing that consisted in part of roast mutton. Chop it fine, and put it in a saucepan with a cup of gravy or of soup stock, season with pepper and salt, and scatter over it, stirring all the time, a tablespoonful of flour; let the meat heat gradually, and, when "boiling hot," set the pan on the back part of the stove, and poach some eggs to serve with the meat. When the eggs are done, put the meat on a platter, and lay the eggs around the edge. With fried potatoes, muffins and good coffee, a wholesome breakfast may be provided at small expense.

Everybody who cares for the sick knows how difficult it is to remove or put on the knit wrapper; it seems as if the invalid needs to assume attitudes that would be almost impossible to one in robust health. A half hour's work with needle and thread will suffice to change a pair of these garments and make them more comfortable. Cut them open the entire length, then put on a facing on one side and a plait on the other; at proper intervals put on some small porcelain buttons and make the button holes, and you will be surprised when this is accomplished that you never thought of doing so before.

"Favorite" pudding is made by beating three eggs very light, the whites and yolks together; flavor with the juice and grated rind of a lemon and half a teaspoonful of grated nutmeg; to this add one cup of grated bread crumbs, one cup of finely chopped apple, one cup of English currants and one and a half cups of sugar; stir these vigorously until well mixed, then put in a buttered pudding dish and boil for at least two hours and a half. Serve with any good sauce, or with cream and sugar alone, or cream and sugar with a wineglass of sherry stirred in.

Good gravy can be made at any time if you have some nice pieces of cold roast meat. Put them in a sauce pan, and pour about a pint of boiling water over them; cover the sauce pan, and let the meat and water simmer on the back of the stove for an hour or more; then strain it through a fine sieve, add butter, pepper and salt; thicken with flour. If lamb or mutton, make the foundation of the gravy, flavor it with a teaspoonful of Worcester sauce, or with the same quantity of parsley, chopped fine.

Cold boiled parsnips, cut in slices and fried in butter, make a good side dish. If the family is large, and it is of importance to economize butter, take one or two thin slices of pork, and fry them. When they are almost done, put the pieces of parsnip in a frying-pan with the pork, and brown them. A lump of butter can be added to give flavor to the fat.

In several of those departments, notably in the treasury, an examination of the pay rolls show that the percentage of colored men employed to the total population is considerably greater than the whites.

Railroad and River News.

The westbound through freight tariff of the Northwestern Pacific and Oregon Railway and Navigation company, issued Aug. 25, has been amended so that the rates to San Francisco, Tacoma and Seattle are the same as to Portland. These rates from St. Paul, Duluth, Minneapolis and Superior are: First-class, $4 55 per 100 pounds; second class, $3.75; third-class, $3; fourth-class, $2.35; class A, $2.10; class B, $1.85; class C, $1.60; class D, $1.35. By this arrangement St. Paul and Minneapolis merchants will be able to lay down goods in San Francisco at the same rates they now ship them to Portland. The Northern Pacific managers are determined to secure a monopoly of this trade, and, with that end in view, will make arrangements that will enable them to put these goods in San Francisco in as good, if not better, time than any other road. The ocean trip will be materially shortened as regards time. Coming east from the coast, canned goods can be shipped to the St. Paul and Minneapolis markets at the same rate as from Portland.

So many trains are now being run over the single track between Duluth and the Northern Pacific Junction that there exists more or less danger of accidents. All side tracks between these places are filled with cars, and it requires a long and tedious process for two trains to pass. This will last for some time, for the Minnesota wheat crop is now on the move. All side tracks on the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba road are full of cars loaded with wheat for Duluth, and the same is true of the Northern Pacific through the wheat country.

The case of The State of Minnesota vs. The Northern Pacific Railroad company was tried on the 29th ult., at St. Paul, before Judge Brill, and submitted. The suit is for the state tax of 3 per cent. on the gross earnings of the road, which, it is claimed, is due on the part of the road between St. Paul and Sauk Center, Minnesota. The corporation claims that it runs over the Manitoba road that distance, and that, therefore, the $12,000 demanded by the state is not just.

A new through freight tariff to all points in the Black Hills via Pierre and the Northwestern Express, Stage and Transportation company has been issued by the Northwestern road, to take effect Oct. 1 The rates from Chicago and common points are as follows: Per 100 pounds, Rapid City Fort Mead and Sturgis City, Dak., $3 75; Deadwood, Crook City and Speer Fish, Dak., $4; Central City, Dak., $4.10; Lead City, Dak., $4.10

The Winnipeg Times says the Winnipeg & Duluth road is to be pushed all along the line early next session. The route as decided on lies along the south side of Clearwater river, and the main Red lake river will be crossed about a mile below its junction with the Clearwater. The railroad company had bought land on both sides of the river at this point, and the new town will be laid out south and southeast of the crossing.

The control of the Nickel Plate railroad, which was supposed to have been acquired by Vanderbilt, is about to be contested by holders of first mortgage bonds in Pennsylvania and elsewhere. The Union and Central Pacific roads, in accordance with the San Francisco agreement, have announced a first-class fare of $95, from Missouri river and Mississippi terminus to San Francisco, and beyond to Portland, O e This is a similar rate to that of the Northern Pacific to San Francisco from St. Paul.

Work on the Wickes branch of the Northern Pacific, from Helena to Wickes, is progressing rapidly, graders being at work along the whole line. There is some talk that the road will be continued to Butte, giving the Northern Pacific an independent line to that point.

The earnings of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba road for the third week in September were $193,200, an increase of $1.400. The Milwaukee, Lake Shore & Western earnings were $23,055, an increase of $4.070.

A third rail is being laid on the Utah & Northern railway from Butte to Garrison to accommodate standard guage cars, and from Harrison to Helena on the standard guage to accommodate the Utah & Northern narrow gauge.

It is reported that a controlling interest in the Pittsburg & Western railway will be shortly transferred to either Garrett, Jewett or Gould. The road has 200 miles of track.

The earnings of the Union Pacific for the third week in September, 1883, were $300,-890, an increase of $22,600.

At Red Wing, Minn., on the 29th ult., an attempt to lynch Hiram Cadwell, the alleged murderer of Erland Lampe, was made. Between sixty to one-hundred gathered at the court house. Twenty-five of them broke open the outer wooden door, and also pried open the wooden door leading to the jail. Here they met resistance from Sheriff Carlson and his deputy, who placed themselves in front of the iron cell door, with drawn revolvers. The mob refused to step back, demanding that the sheriff deliver to them Hiram Cadwell. Several shots were fired, both by the mob and sheriff, but none were injured. Meantime the fire bells were rung, and the police and citizens hastened to the spot, and succeeded in driving the mob back.

Colored Men's Address to the People.

The Colored Men's convention, recently in session at Louisville, Ky., adopted the following address to the people:

First—That we are grateful for and rejoice in the marvelous emancipation that came to our race twenty years ago. The shock of embattled armies was the lullaby of a nation born in a day. We do not, we can not, forget the great sacrifice of women and heroic men who made possible the struggle in which treason and slavery were consigned to a common sepulcher, nor would we be unmindful of the measure of devotion and patriotism that the white and colored soldiers rendered the nation.

Second—We are not insensible to the fact that the congress of the United States has spread upon the statute books many laws calculated to make us secure in our rights as citizens; nor would we be forgetful of the magnificent amendments to the constitution intended to render forever impossible human slavery.

Third—We do not ask any mere class legislation. We have enough of this; but we do believe that many of the laws intended to secure us our rights as citizens are nothing more than dead letters. In the Southern States, almost without exception, colored people are denied justice in the courts, denied the fruit of their honest labor, defrauded of their political rights at the ballot box, shut out from learning trades, cheated out of their civil rights by inn-keepers and common carrier companies, and left by the States to an inadequate opportunity for education and general improvement.

Fourth—We regard the labor question, education and moral training paramount to all other questions. We believe that question, especially in the South, needs recasting, and that the plantation credits and mortgage system should be abolished. Honest labor should be remunerated. The landholders of the South should recognize that this question is to be solved by encouraging the negroes to industry, frugality and business habits; by inciting them to habits of thrift; by assisting them to acquire an interest in the soil; by paying them honest wages for honest work, and by making them content and happy in the land of their nativity. While men of the soil in the South can settle the question of labor and capital between white and black, we believe that a broad, comprehensive system should be inaugurated looking toward the education of young colored girls, so that they may become intelligent and faithful women, and by the aid of which young colored boys may learn trades. The religious and moral training of our race should not be neglected.

Sixth—The failure of the Freedmen's Savings and Trust company is the marvel of our times. It was established to receive the earnings of persons heretofore held in bondage, and the descendants of such persons. The government should reimburse the creditors of the bank.

Seventh—Distinction between white and colored troops in the regular army is un-American, unjust and ungrateful. White men can enter any branch of the service, but colored men are confined to the cavalry and infantry service.

Eighth—It is not our province to dictate a policy for the government of action of our fellow citizens in the several States. It is a matter that their circumstances, patriotism, and needs should shape.

Ninth—As a race struggling and contending for our political and civil rights, we are not unmindful of the efforts of Ireland to gain her freedom, and we give to our Irish friends our profound sympathy and best wishes.

Tenth—We earnestly desire the abolition of chain gangs, the admittance to trades unions of men of our race and employment in commercial pursuits.

Eleventh—In nearly every State of the Union, both North and South, the people of our race are not allowed to enter freely in trades or gain employment in the higher walks of life. This is unworthy of our institutions and hurtful to the reputation of our country at home and abroad.

The Law of Citizenship.

The following is the law relating to persons who come to this country under age and desire to vote:

"Any person who immigrates into the United States from a foreign country, three years before coming of age, and maintains his residence here until 21 years and two years longer; may, at the expiration of the whole five years, be admitted to all the rights and privileges of a citizen without making the preliminary declaration of his intentions to becoming such, but he must then make an oath that for two years past such has been his intention, and fully comply with all the other requirements of the naturalization laws"

"Tis ever the way of the foolish fair to die for the one who does not care," sings Ella Wheeler. Yes, Ella, and it is often the way with the big brothers of the foolish fair. Week after week they go down to the barber shop and "dye for the one that does not care."—Middletown Transcript.

CARL SPRINGEL.

Carl Springel is the name of a boy who is held in remembrance over half of Germany, for a deed of self-sacrificing heroism which is unparalleled in the legends of Rome and Greece, or the annals of more modern chivalry.

It is not so very hard for the soldier to face the cannon-balls and bullets on the battle-field, for well he knows that, while there are many chances of death, there is still some chances for life.

Carl Springel, a poor, lame German boy, to save many human beings from an awful death, walked straight into the face of certain death himself, and met it like a hero.

On the 10th of November, 1867, a terrible rain storm swept over Southern Germany. For twenty hours the rain poured down in torrents as had never before been known in that region, and it seemed as if the day were to be the beginning of a second deluge. Rivers overflowed their banks, and pretty streams were frozen into rivers.

At nine o'clock at night the storm raged on with unabated violence, when Carl Springel set out on his crutches, from the hut in which he lived alone, to carry an evening repast to his parent, who was on watch duty at the bridge over "Devil's Gulch," on the Great South German Railway.

The Devil's Gulch is a fanciful name given to an immense cleft in the rocks, 200 feet wide and 150 feet deep, which had been spanned by a strong bridge of wood and iron, believed by the engineers who constructed it to be capable of withstanding all possible assaults of the wind and water.

It was the duty of William Springel, Carl's father, to keep guard at the bridge on stormy nights, and warn the oncoming trains of any lurking danger which might exist.

Beneath the bridge a mountain stream boiled and bubbled in ordinary times; on that night the heavy rains had swollen it to a furious torrent.

Carl Springel hobbled slowly along upon his crutches through the almost Egyptian darkness of the night, half blinded by the rain, but buoyed up by the thought that he was bringing cheer and comfort to his father.

When within a hundred yards of the bridge, an awful crash sounded out upon the night air, loud above the din of the storm, and a shudder ran through his brave young soul.

It was the bridge—the bridge that had been deemed impregnable. The bridge had succumbed to the fury of the water, which rushed down upon its foundations in irresistible torrents from the mountain side.

Hurrying as fast as he could, Carl reached the railroad track, and his worst fears were realized. Upon the track, some ten feet away from where the entrance of the bridge had been, was his father's hand-car, with his red lantern burning dimly in it, and by the lantern's light Carl could see the full extent of the disaster. Every section, every timber of the bridge had been swept away, and the yawning gulf and the roaring flood were all that was left.

"Father! father!" cried Carl in his loudest tones. "Father! father!" he called again, "where are you?"

But no answering voice responded, and there rushed across his brain the terrible certainty that his father had gone down with the bridge.

For a moment his breast was filled with unutterable anguish. But it was only for a moment. Quick as thought it flashed upon his mind that it was almost time for the last night train from the great city above to come rushing along with its living freight.

No danger signal gleamed from the watch tower upon the bridge; on they would come, unconscious of their peril until it would be too late, and they would be dashed in a moment into the seething flood more than a hundred feet below.

What was to be done? Forgetting for the instant the great woe that had befallen him, Carl decided at once that it was his duty to supply his father's place, and warn the train of its peril in time to save it, if possible. But what could he do?

The tempest increased in its fury, and the rain poured down as though it could never stop. Hark! the train is coming. Already he hears it rumbling on toward destruction, and it must be near, or he could not hear it above the storm.

He can not run with his poor, crippled legs, so he throws himself upon the hand-car and nerves himself for a mighty effort.

As though his life were at stake, he begins to turn. Slowly at first, then faster and faster, he drives the car in the direction of the approching train.

On, on, dashes the mighty iron horse; nearer and nearer it comes. Oh, if he can only warn them while there is yet time to stop the train! If only he can get far enough off to save the train from rushing headlong into that horrible grave!

Around the mountain side, on the curving track, the train speeds along. The gleam of its light is now upon the valley, and the boy knows that the supreme moment is at hand.

On thunders the engine, and the track trembles beneath the heavy burden. Suddenly, around a sharp bend, a hundred feet away, full on his sight bursts the blazing headlight of the engine.

Ceasing from his labor, Carl Springel braces himself with one hand, and, grasping the red lantern in the other, swings it widely above his head.

"The bridge is down! The bridge is down!" he cries with all his power. "The bridge is do——!"

The engineer has seen him, but can not save him. With a dull thud the engine clears the obstruction from the track, and dashes along—but slower and slower now.

The hand car and the boy were hurled fifty feet through the air, and when the boy is found his body is crushed, mangled and lifeless. But the train is saved Trembling, gasping, staggering, the engine halts—halts not a dozen yards from the mouth of the yawning chasm—and all on board are saved—saved by the unparalleled heroism of this crippled boy, who has given up his life that they may live.

Two years ago in a quiet village cemetery in the South of Germany, I saw the grave in which he sleeps. Upon a modest tombstone at his head, erected by the gratitude of those whose lives he had preserved, in this inscription:

> "CARL SPRINGEL,
> Aged 14,
> He died the death of a hero and martyr and saved two hundred lives."

A hero and martyr he was indeed—and sometime yet bards and poets will sing the story of this brave young peasant boy of Germany.

Embarrassing Situation for a Young Man

From the New York Tribune.

The scene, and it was a rather funny one took place in a ladies' cabin in a Fulton ferry boat. The seats were all taken and there was sitting on one side of the cabin among others a young man with the self complacency of one who has good looks and is correctly attired. Presently a lady and a little girl entered the cabin, the latter carrying a large, handsomely dressed doll. Glancing around the laby observed that no seats were empty, and then fixing her eye on the young man, approached with a pleasant, half apologetic expression, and asked if she might place place the doll beside him on the seat, which he did not completely fill. The young man started and stammered his assent, and the lady and girl passed out on the forward deck to enjoy the air. The other passengers smiled, but the young man sat it out until the boat reached the other side of the river, though his cheeks were about as red as the cheeks of the doll.

People We Talk About.

A daughter of General Winfield Scott is the wife of a Virginian of the same name.

Washington once speculated in Mohawk Valley land, as is shown by an old deed in the library of Horace Seymour.

From his familiarity with all subjects, Professor Tyndall is winning a reputation in England as a "professor at the breakfast-table."

Evangelist Barnes, after bribing a policeman to admit him to the House of Commons, writes home how cleverly he managed it, signing himself "Ever in Jesus."

The plate on the coffin of the Count de Chambord is inscribed with the words, "Henry the Fifth, by the Grace of God King of France and Navarre," and he was that neither by the grace of God nor by the people.

The Abbe Franz Liszt, who has been staying for some time in Weimar, is giving the finishing touches to his great oratorio, "Stanislaus," which he has been hard at work upon for some years past.

Mr. Gilbert flatly denies the report that he would prevent Miss Mary Anderson from appearing as "Galatea."

"The smallest hair," says Goethe, "throws its shadow." It does, it does. And if it happens to throw the penumbra across the butter, it casts its little gloom over the entire community.

Gen. Putnam (of wolf killing fame) is buried in the pretty village cemetery, half a mile southwest of Pomfret, Conn., an inclosure of several acres, with quiet air, green turf, sombre firs, and dry, sandy soil. In a secluded corner of the yard, among many broken mossy tombstones, a heavy table of marble lies on a wall of brick that lifts it but five or six inches from the ground. The stone is about six feet long by two and a half wide, and marks the grave of Putnam. Fully a third of it has been chipped off by relic hunters.

The Comte de Paris, although he has assumed no new appellation since the death of the Comte de Chambord, signing himself simply "Philippe, Comte de Paris," has modified his arms, taking what are known as 'les armes franches." The label which characterizes the arms of a younger branch disappears from his escutcheon, which now bears simply the three golden fleurs de lis upon an azure field.

The Hon. George B. Loring, in his address before the New England Agricultural Society showed that the farmers of New England are growing richer. He said: "The decline of certain branches of farming, especially of those staples that can be more cheaply produced elsewhere, is attended by an increase of all those products that enter into immediate home consumption; and hence it is that the number of farms has increased, the production of butter has been enlarged, the sale of milk has become an important branch of the dairy, and the aggregate value of the annual products of the soil is greatly enhanced."

A story is told about W. W. Astor, our Minister to Rome. When he introduced his wife to King Humbert that royal personage complimented him upon the beauty of the lady, to which Astor replied, with the utmost modesty: "Si, Majesti, si." Mr. Astor is now spoken of everywhere as "Si Majesti, si."

Mr. Joseph Jacobs, in his "Studies on Jewish Statistics," disposes of the disposition that John Bright is of Jewish descent. He believes the statement that Mr. Bright's great-great-grandmother, Martha Jacobs, was a Jewess, is altogether erroneous. That a farmer in a Wiltshire hamlet a century and a half ago should have courted and won a Jewish bride is a wild improbability. Jacobs is a common name in South Wales, and Wiltshire is not very far from the Welsh border. There can be little doubt that John Bright's alleged Jewish blood is really Welsh.

Alexander III is the despair of opera managers in St. Petersburg. Once the Czar was a boon to them; for the announcement that he would "honor the performance" was sure to crowd the house. But now the mere suspicion that he may attend scares the public away; for they see visions of bombs, dynamite and sudden death. Yet the Emperor cannot be asked to stay away.

Devout Moslems confidently predict the end of the world on November 8, the close of the Mohammedan thirteenth century. Tradition declares that in the present month, during the Ramadan fast, the sun shall rise in the west, the day of mercy and forgiveness shall cease and that of judgment and retribution begin. Thus, a proclamation has been issued from Mecca warning all true believers to prepare for the coming day, which has been widely circulated, and has created a great impression.

Population of the Austrian Empire.

The census of the population of the Austrian empire, taken for the night of Dec. 31, 1880, gives the following general results: The total population of the whole empire was 37,786,000 souls. Of these, 15,642,002 fell to the Hungarian portion, and 22,144,244 to the Austrian or Cisleithan portion. According to their nationality, the populations are distributed as follows, in round numbers: There are 10,000,000 Germans, 6,191,000 Magyars, 7,055,000 Bohemians, Moravians, and Slovaks, 3,290,000 Poles, 3,180,000 Ruthenians, 1,220,000 Slovenes, 4,176,000 Serbo-Croats and 2,513,000 Roumanians. There are, taking them altogether, 19,000,000 Slavs—a little more than half the whole population of the empire. The ratio of population to area is moderate. In the western portion, embracing an area of 300,259 square kilometres, the ratio is 74 to the square kilometre; whereas in the eastern portion with an area of 324,015 square kilometris, the ratio of population is only 48.3 to the square kilometre. The corresponding ratios are: In England, 187; in Belgium, 181; in Saxony, 173; in Germany 84; in France, 71; in Russia, 15 to the square kilometre. With respect to religion, the inhabitants of Austria-Hungary are classified as follows: Roman Catholics, 29,753,169; Orthodox Greek, 3,450,000; Calvinists, 2,130,000; Evangelical (German Reformed Church), 1,450,000; Jews, 1,640,000. The Jews dwell principally in Galicia, Hungary, Moravia, and Vienna; in Vienna alone there are 86,000, or about one-twelfth of the whole population.

The widows of Presidents Tyler and Polk both draw their $5,000 annual government pensions at Knoxville, Tenn.

"Shure Pat, I'll be after goin' in," said Dinnis. Must the Timber Culture Act Go?

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Sept. 26.—During the past summer the commissioner of the general land office has had in the States and Territories where there are large quantities of unsold lands a large force of special agents, engaged in the detection and investigation of fraudulent entries under the pre-emption, homestead and timber culture acts. The reports of those agents reveal such a condition of affairs that in all probability the secretary of the interior in his annual report will recommend the repeal not only of the pre-emption laws, but of the timber culture act also. Among the considerations which it is believed will be urged in favor of repeal are:

First—That practically the actual settler can get a title to his farm as soon under the homestead act as under the pre-emption law, and there is no need of two methods to attain the same object.

Second—That while the three laws remain, a settler may take advantage of each and acquire title to 480 acres of the public land by paying cash for 160 acres, and taking the remainder under the homestead and timber culture, etc., a quantity which, it is suggested, is greater than the settler should be permitted to obtain on such easy terms in the present condition of affairs.

Third—That both the pre-emption and the timber laws offer a premium to dishonesty, as is clearly shown by the number of fraudulent entries which have been detected.

Alaska girls have buttonholes in their lips.

Warren Sheaf: J. J. McLennan, editor of the Marshall County Leader skipped the country last week for parts unknown, taking with him it is said a large amount of money belonging to a loan company. One of his bondsmen was down here on Tuesday after the Sheriff to close and take possession of a stock of drugs recently put in at Stephen by Mr. McLennan to save, if possible, a part of the money for which his bondsmen are held. This act of Mr. McLennan seems very strange to us, as we thought him a very exemplary young man. This leads us to ask who is there in this world that we can fully trust.

If there ever was a time when the Red River Valley has proved itself one of the grandest domains in the world, it is the past year; the mouths of prejudiced grumblers, who have berated the Valley and its resources have been hermetically sealed; the hands of malicious decriers which have been turned against it have been palsied, and the Valley has marched to the front grandly victorious over all. Never has the yields throughout the Northwest been so gratifying and profitable as the present season. Never has the grain been of so fine a quality, and never was change wrought more wonderfully or miraculously in any age or land than that which so suddenly developed wheat fields, seared and burned' neath a spiteful sun, into acres that seemed to groan under the weight of their own production.

The millers are unanimous in their assertions that never has grain graded better, and farmers declare never has the product been greater on an average per acre. These facts speak in terms more forcible than can be spoken or written in favor of the Valley, whose resources are not yet half realized, and whose influence in the marts of the world is destined to be the ruling.

A Bear Hunt.

Warren Sheaf: On Tuesday afternoon, Sept. 25th John Hull, residing five miles east, of Warren discovered a huge bear in a small grove near his place, and he immediately informed some of his neighbors who were threshing not far distant, whereupon the atmosphere became exceedingly hot for Mrs. Bruin, when she discovered that John Hull, David Hull, Charles Hull, Joseph Hull, Charles Woolery, John Egman, and Master Bert Slee were bent on the destruction of herself and family of three cubs. The party with blood in their eyes, palpitating hearts and trembling limbs took up the chase and after traveling through several small groves, and with the use of several shot guns and a Winchester rifle, they succeeded in securing their game. While the chase was most exciting Mrs. Annie Hull and Miss Jennie McCrea attached a team to a light wagon and proceeded to the seat of war to recover the spoils where they arrived at the close of the exciting scene. Thus ended one of the most exciting bear hunt yet reported within the Red River Valley. The march homeward was a trumphal one, such only as victors can well understand. We acknowledge the northeast quarter of a three-fourths grown young bear.

Plant More Fruit.

The Western Agriculturist advises farmers to plant more fruit for the family. Now is the time to set out small fruits of all kinds. Strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, etc., well started this fall, will bear fruit next season. No farmer should be without these luxuries. Grapes, too, and apples, pears and plums are all readily grown in sufficient quantity for home use. A good garden and small orchard, well taken care of, pay more than any acre on the farm, besides the luxury, benefit, pleasure and health that it gives the family.

There is virtue in the soil, health in the natural order of existence. In farm life there are many hardships it is true, but the compensations are numerous and full. It was James Parton who said:

"Separated from the soil, man never yet has succeeded in thriving. At best, without it, he is a potted plant, and some of the pots are miserably small. I have visited many factories in New England, and I find that wherever the operatives have a good sized garden with access to a pasture for a cow, the people are healthy, contented and saving. Whenever this is the case, the population is likely to live without actual starvation or extreme destitution in the events of mills being closed for even a very long period. Whenever they are separated from the soil, as in some of our large and crowded cities, there is squalor, demoralization and despair."

In this there is far more than the grain of truth that seasons many proverbs. The true home of healthful manhood, physical and mental, is the free air of heaven on the soil. All else is artificial, with the restrictions that invite penalties, except as they are carefully regarded.

Food Makes the Man.

Speaking roughly, about three-fourths, by weight, of the body of man is constituted by the fluid he consumes, and the remaining fourth by the solid material he appropriates. It is therefore no figure of speech to say, that food makes the man. We might even put the case in a stronger light and affirm that man is his food. It is strictly and literally true that "A man who drinks beer thinks beer." We make this concession to the teetotalers, and will add that good sound beer is by no means a bad thought factor, whatever may be the intellectual value of the commodity commonly sold and consumed under that name! It cannot obviously be a matter of indifference what a man eats and drinks. He is, in fact, choosing his animal and moral character when he selects his food. It is impossible for him to change his inherited nature, simply because modification of development occupy more than an individual life, but he can help to make the particular stock to which he belongs more or less beery or fleshy or watery, and so on, by the way he feeds. We know the effect the feeding of animals has on their temper and very natures; how the dog fed on raw meat and chained up so that he cannot work off the superfluous nitrogenized material by exercise becomes a savage beast, while the same creature fed on bread and milk would be tame as a lamb. The same law of results is applicable to man, and every living organism is propagated "in its kind" with a physical and mental likeness. This is the underlying principle of development. Happily the truth is beginning, though slowly and imperfectly, to find recognition it has long been denied. It is possible that in the natural desire to secure the best, purest supplies of food and drink for man we are pushing matters a little to extremes and becoming ridiculous. Utopia is a long way off, and "Hygeia" has not been built. It is, however, desirable that we should aim high and make the teachings of physiological science the precepts of our daily life and conduct. We may not be able to reach our ideal, but progress will be advanced by striving to make its attainment an object "What to eat, drink and avoid" is a rational proposition, and if some of us are becoming a little unreasonable in the attempt to solve it, at least we are on the right road and ought to be encouraged rather than abashed by the not unkindly criticism our endeavors are calling forth.—Albany Argus.

Some Mistakes.

Minnesota Farmer.

Farming occupies too important a place among the industries of man to be a secondary topic of consideration. On the contrary it ranks first of all occupations. Our common necessities and needs of every day life make it such and no law can change this system, and the work of the husbandman must and shall be forever our main dependence. As the world has advanced in all things, agriculture has, we believe, kept equal pace with the strides of all industries, and, in many instances the new developments which it has made by the help of science and the inventive genius, has been the means of fostering many other branches of trade and giving a grand impetus to the whole progress of the age. This is indeed creditable and worthy of our praise; but, when we take into consideration the vast number who are engaged in agriculture—and the value of the soil occupied by the farmers throughout the land, the results of their labor do not show that everything is working to an advantage, and the profits look decidedly small in some instances. The causes of this may be attributed to some mistakes which our farmers are making. Some realize every year that there is a leakage and rectify the error, while others go on year after year in the same old track and make no progress. Farmers as a whole are observing and awake to the best interests of themselves and the farm. Economy is practiced and care taken to save up everything possible, but there is a certain inconsistency visible here and there, which deserves the strictest censure. It is foolish for some farmers to be wielded by the glib tongued agent of agricultural machinery who stands ready to sell his machine on long time easy payments, etc., taking for his security the rich acres which afford so much happiness for the farm household, and provides for the wants of the farmer and family. Labor saving machines are a great saving to farmers who have a good sized farm to cultivate, but let those who have no dependence but the year's crop, use a little more manual labor, until they are able to purchase such machinery as they may need without involving in debt their farm they now possess, and which has been earned by years of hard toil. If they persist in doing this they must expect a miserable existence, and live without the needed comforts of life. Hundreds of beautiful farms that picture the land about us are clouded by mortgages, perhaps given by the farmer without due consideration. It is far better to cultivate less acres and be independent than to strive to handle a large farm and in order to do so involve everything. We do not wish to keep back the progress of the times, for we well know the improved machinery of to-day is doing a good work. But there is no progress for those who invest and have to mortgage their home and farms If farmers of small means and limited resources would be more cautious their eventide of life would have pleasant memories, and prosperity would mark all they possess. More diligence should be shown in the cultivation of all parts of the farm, and each resource should be utilized to the fullest extent. Besides the raising of crops, the farmer might keep enough stock to pay for the running expenses of the farm, and his No. 1 hard would then be free from all incumbrances

Stock raising when conducted on the proper plan has always proved a success and no farmer need fear to adopt this industry as a few dollars carefully invested will yield a handsome profit in a short time. Show more care for the small things about the farm—the garden implements, numerous tools, etc., and keep up the necessary repairs about the sheds and fences. This will apply to farmers of all classes—the rich and poor, as quite often negligence is detected on farms where there is everything to keep up repairs. There are scores of other mistakes that could be mentioned; but would the farmers endeavor to correct some of the most noticeable errors which are made, it would not be long before many great changes would take place and households that are now darkened by failures and drawbacks of all kinds would take on a new life.

Book Farming.

It is lamentable that there is so much prejudice among farmers in this enlightened age against what is called "Book Farming." To pursue a farmer's calling wisely and profitably, requires much study, reading and experimenting. This is a progressive age, yet agriculture is lingering in the lap of ignorance. It should be the aim of every farmer to elevate the standard of agricultural knowledge. I think our school systems are woefully at fault in not providing for the farmer boys to become educated in the rudiments of agriculture. The education acquired in our schools is good so far as it goes, but it only prepares us for the business or commercial affairs of life. We need something more; we should have text books on farming, and every country school teacher should be a practical and scientific farmer, and should teach the principles of agriculture. Then as the boys grow up to be men, farming would become more pleasant and profitable. Every man should be educated specially for his calling. As a Nation we boast of our intelligence, and in politics, religion and the general news of the day, farmers are generally well informed, but on points of agriculture very few of us are well informed. How many farmers can name a single element of plant food? We all know that stable manure applied to crops will, under almost all circumstances, increase the yield, but what is in this manure that causes such luxuriant growth? We know but little. We should be educated to know all the elements which enter into the composition of plants; know whence they are derived and how assimilated. There are no books, so far as I know, better calculated to give farmers this needed information, than Johnson's "How Crops Grow" and "How Crops Feed." These two volumes should be in every farmer's library. Agriculture is the basis of national prosperity, it supports commerce, it feeds the busy millions of miners, manufacturers, merchants, etc.; it demands our greatest efforts to place it upon a higher intellectual plane. Inventors are each year placing before us new and improved machinery for farming, to lessen our labors and give us more time for amusement and study. This improved mechanics has to a great extent been used to increase our crops by cultivating more extended areas. It should not be so much the object of farmers to increase their crops as to decrease the cost of production. Many farmers make large outlays for commercial fertilizers without fully understanding the needs of the soil, and, consequently, the extra yield of the crop does not pay for the fertilizers.

Now, every farmer should take a few good agricultural papers and buy a few of the best agricultural books, read and study them carefully, but not swallow everything he sees in printer's ink, for the best writers get on the wrong side of a subject sometimes, and have to acknowledge it afterward. Then, by hard and patient study and cautious experiments, the farmer may elevate his calling, improve his land, increase his crops, and decrease the cost of production.—Correspondence Farming World.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, OCT. 4.

LOCAL NEWS.

The loveliest kind of lovely weather.

J. I. Jenkinson, of Muskoda, broke his arm last week.

Harry Halverson was in from Maple Lake on Friday and gladdened the heart of the printer by putting up $2 on subscription.

Mrs. I. U. Jennings has just received a large stock of New Millinery Goods consisting of Hats, Feathers, Plumes, Plushes, Satins, Ribbons, Etc., all of the latest patterns and designs. [23-tf]

Conductor J. B. Copeland sent a lot of fine prairie chickens to his better half last week. Four of 'em lit onto our table on Friday, nice, fat, large birds, and on Saturday and Sunday—such pies and baked birds! Yum! yum!

Mr. Knute Steenerson, of the St. Hilaire Times, made us a pleasant call on Friday en route to his old home where he has gone to sell some farm property. Mr. S. has labored faithfully in the interests of St. Hilaire since he established the Times.

While in Fargo last Saturday we came across an old schoolmate of ours in the person of Dr. A. F. McKay, who came to Fargo from Washington, D. C., in February last, and who has built up a large practice in the busy, bustling city of Fargo. The doctor has an elegant office in the Keeney block, opposite the Continental, and also has a complete suit of bath rooms where you can take a regular Turkish bath if you like. Frank always would have everything of the very best or none, and so we now find him possessed of a lovely wife and handsome children and the largest practice in Fargo. He makes chronic cases a specialty and contemplates extending his practice to other points in northern Dakota and Minnesota. May he attain the full measure of success that his worth deserves is the hearty wish of his old schoolmate, Cooke, of the JOURNAL.

The Clerks of Districts No. 1, 2, 15, 26, 28, 35, 40, 47, 52, 44, 65, 73, 78, 79, 80, 83, 85, 86, 91, 93, 94, 95, 98 and 100 have filed reports with the County Auditor of tax voted for the present year. The following towns are reported, viz:

Bygland, Bristol, Crookston, Euclid, Farley, Godfrey, Grand Forks, Gentilly, Grove Park, Gardon, Hammond, Keystone, Kertsonville, Lake Pleasant, Lambert, Lowell Onstead, Poplar River, Red Lake Falls, Reis, Tilden, Tynsid, Vineland and the village of Red Lake Falls.

From the above it appears that only one-fourth of all the school districts and about one-third the townships have thus far reported.

Clerks should bear in mind that October 10th is the last day for filing reports, and be governed accordingly.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

New wheat is coming in, and so far is of the very best quality No. 1 hard, 61 to 65 pounds to the bushel. Such grain as that should satisfy the most exacting.

Anton Kaus, an old experienced miller from Parkdale, Minn., and his son Henry Kaus, are visiting Mr. John Walters, and looking over the milling prospects of Red Lake Falls with an eye to chances for investment.

C. L. Brainard commenced on Tuesday of last week the survey of the property north and east of Red Lake River and adjoining the mill sites. The work will be completed as fast as possible, and the platting done at once. The property is very handsomely located and can not fail to be in earnest demand at an early day.

Arrangements have been completed for the opening of a school in district No. 63, next Monday if a teacher is secured in time. Mr. W. W. Wilson has been repairing and furnishing a house which Mr. Kretzschmar has given the use of, and it will be used until the district is able to build. The trustees are looking for a teacher, and expect to have about 35 to 37 regular pupils this term.

St. Hilaire Packet.

From the Spectator.

As Mr. S. F. Morse was helping some workmen at his son's house on Monday last, he was knocked down from the roof by a large tree that was being cut down. He fell a distance of some fifteen feet, but escaped without much injury.

The workmen for the construction of the round house, section house and depot, arrived Saturday evening last, and these structures will be completed at once, and will add very much to the appearance of the town, as well as to the convenience of the public.

On Saturday last, as Capt. J. K Arnold was returning from the train, his team became frightened and ran for a short distance throwing Mr. Arnold out and bruising him somewhat but not seriously. He will be all right in a day or two.

Mr. Lewis Comstock brought the first load of grain to St. Hilaire elevator on the 25th inst. Unfortunately they were not ready to receive grain, as no buyer has as yet been assigned to their ware house. We hope the elevator Co., will not delay in this matter, as many of our farmers have threshed and wish to dispose of their surplus grain at once.

The stacking is all done in this vicinity, and considerable of the threshing. So far as heard from, the average yield is over twenty bushels per acre of No. 1 hard. Oats go about sixty bushels per acre; potatoes are an enormous yield this year, and prices no doubt will be correspondingly low, but the increased facilities for shipment from this point renders the crop of more value this year than ever before. The outside demand will be heavy, and those having potatoes for sale, will do well to hold them until later in the season.

From the Times.

We have seen many Crookstonites on our streets the past week, around with guns and dogs. They are making it lively for the prairie chickens, and the bears will have to look a little more out after this.

A crew of carpenters arrived last Saturday and are busily at work on the new depot. It will be divided into four our five rooms neatly finished off, and when ready for occupancy, Mr. Pease, our station agent, will feel more at home in St. Hilaire.

Mr. Rydell is now duly installed at St. Hilaire and is having charge of the elevator ro grain house at this place. There are large quantities of wheat tributary to this place, especially on the south and east of us. Mr. Rydell says he will pay Crookston prices, and if he gives reasonable satisfaction in inspection and weight, there is no doubt but what St. Hilaire will get more wheat than can conveniently be handled, and it is of considerable importance for this town to get a good reputation as a wheat market on the start. To have a good wheat market s of more importance and does more to make all kinds of business lively and build up the town, than any other branch of business.

F. C. Ashall & Co., has made arrangements with Mr. Harris of Crookston, to come up and move their large hardware store to St. Hilaire. There are others who may take advantage of the opportunity for moving while Mr. Harris has his apparatus up here. Among those whom we hear are likely to take advantage of the facilities thus afforded for moving, are Mr. Morse, bank of St. Hilaire; Fritz Eikhoff, furniture store; E. A. Ranson & Co, drug store; C. C. Utzinger, building and the Spectator building, will also come.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

The elevator men are kept busy handling the immense quantity of grain, which is arriving daily.

Sumner Ross, of New Hampshire was in town on Monday, looking after a chance for investments.

The bridge known as the toll bridge has been purchased by the citizens of Grand Forks, and hereafter will be free to the public.

Sunday night, two tramps while under the influence of liquor, entered the deserted house near the point, with a view of passing the night, but becoming engaged in a quarrel one of them struck the other over the head with a club, almost crushing in his skull. By the time assistance arrived both were sobered up. The wound was dressed after a fashion, and the following morning both disappeared, as no trace has since been seen of them.

Arne A Higdem will shortly shake the dust of East Grand Forks from his feet—at least he says so—and take up his permanent residence in Grand Forks. Mr. Higdem, no doubt, is tired of living away from the busy haunts of men, and wishes to seek a wide scope for his talents. Our rival will soon, we feel, recognize his worth as a public officer, and reward him accordingly.

On last Saturday evening the Aldrich brothers, while driving across their claim, some eight miles from town, encountered a black bear, which was evidently on its way to Minnesota to bask in the warm and genial climate of this State during the coming winter. The boys unhitched their horses and drove bruin in the direction of their shanty, where they got hold of an old musket and charged it with shot. After pouring half a dozen charges into the animal he sucumbed. The bear weighed nearly 500 pounds.

Quite an excited discussion took place a few days since between the bridge-tender of the free bridge and a farmer, who was hauling a cord of wood over the structure. The bridge man said that no one was allowed to haul a cord of wood over the bridge, as it was not strong enough to withstand the strain. However, the farmer got his wood over, and said he would haul as many cords as he wished. The bridgeman is not much in an argument, but when it comes to shaking his fists in the air and bellowing like an ox he is just immense; but this time the granger was too much for him and carried his point. A bridge that wont sustain a cord of dry wood ought to be blown up.

What's in a Name?

"Three large bears were ushered into the "animal kingdom" the other morning by Joe Barthlammel, of Crookstown."

The above astounding item is taken from the Stoughton Hub, a Wisconsin paper. In our issue of Sept. 20th we mentioned that Joe Barthiaume had killed three bears and the Hub doubtless takes its item from that. Joe is now wondering what they will call him when the item gets as far as New York if the adjoining State butchers him in such a reckless manner.

A VICTIM TO WHISKY.

From the Norman County Index.

Last Monday evening shortly before 6 o'clock, as John Malan and the section crew were returning home from work they found the dead body of a man about one-half mile below the Wild Rice River. The coroner was notified, who went down on a hand car and brought the corpse to this city. Persons in this city identified the deceased as M. Arstad, a man who had been in and about the city during the past week. Arstad came to Ada early last week from the thirteen townships and while in the city drank very heavily, being continually drunk. Monday morning about 7 o'clock he had a fit on the street near the passenger depot, at which time his condition attracted attention, but after recovering from the fit he denied feeling unwell. During the morning he made inquiries in regard to the distance to Glyndon, and shortly afterward departed in that direction. About 12 o'clock he was seen by Louis Hanson a short distance below Bowman's place, which is about a mile from the city. When seen he was lying near the roadside and appeared as if drunk. Mr. Hanson asked him what he was doing there, whereupon Arstad raised up and looked at him, and then sank back without replying and groaned. This was probably the last seen of him alive. When Malan found him he was lying on his face with his hand under his head, and was lying about two feet from the track. Mr. Malan said he had passed the spot where deceased was found about 2 o'clock and was certain he was not there at that time; and also that he had not been injured by the cars. An inquest was held Tuesday morning, at which the evidense given was in accordance with the above. After hearing the facts the jury returned a verdict as follows:

We find that M. Arstad's death was caused by a fit, which was brought about by the excessive use of intoxicating liquor.

D. C. Lightbourn,	O. H. Myran,
H. Holden,	A. W. Mott,
Ira Wheelock,	J. H. Lemley.

Monday night Coroner Koyl telegraphed to the chief of police at Fergus Falls asking him to notify M. Arstad's friends. Tuesday a reply was received with instructions to do what was seen fit with the body. Accordingly the body was buried Tuesday afternoon in the city cemetery.

A Little Story of the Great War.

Fredericksburg Free Standard.

"The lodge of Masons in which George Washington was "initiated, passed and raised," Fredericksburg, No. 4, was pillaged in 1862; when that town was attacked by hostile soldiery, the lodge safe blown open and the records, regalia, jewels, etc., carried off. Among the articles taken was an old jewel of solid silver in the form of a "level," highly prized by the lodge for its antiquity. The old relic was recently discovered by the secretary of Integrity Lodge, No. 158, A. F. and A. M., of Philadelphia, in the safe of that lodge, where it had been deposited for safe keeping during the war by a former member of Integrity lodge, who had recovered it from a soldier who acknowledged having taken it from the lodge room No. 4. A note tacked to the jewel required its delivery to No. 4, "when the State of Virginia should cease to be in open rebellion against the authority of the government of the United States." The jewel was returned last week to lodge No. 4."

Kittson County Items.

Kittson County Enterprise.

The threshers are very busy and men are still scarce.

Mr. Ohmer, the railroad eating house boss, assumed the management of hotel Oakland at Kennedy last Wednesday.

The country around Hallock is well dotted by wheat stacks, hay stacks and new houses; signs of prosperity on every hand.

Mr. A. Walter of the Burkhardt brewery at Crookston, was is Hallock Wednesday looking after his interests. He reports an increasing business all along the line.

Some of the Roseau Lake Indians had a splendid Moose head, prepared for the taxidermist. They only asked a few (6) dollars for the head; as usual the editor was short or we would have taken it in.

On Sunday night, at hotel Nelson, a man while looking at his shot gun accidently discharged the load in a crowded room, but luckily it passed through window curtains and glass, doing no further damage.

Mr. Peter Pauli has the highest average yet, 23½ per acre, out of the half bushel measure at the threshing machine, that we have heard of. This shows, as Mr. Pauli says, that thorough cultivation will pay.

Capt. Donaldson has been solicited to send a sample of his wheat to Washington with a view of distributing it for seed among other farmers (through the National Bureau of Agriculture) in order to encourage the growth of the best No. 1 hard wheat in new districts now being opened up.

Every day long rows of wagons are to be seen waiting their turns to unload at the elevator. Wheat is coming in very fast, still many are holding back for a rise in prices and expect to get a dollar per bushel before the holidays for the finest wheat yet raised (as a rule) in the Red River valley. We hope their wishes may be realized.

We are informed by Capt. Donaldson that his wheat on the large farm will not be over 15 bushels per acre on the entire land seeded, but he has pieces that run as high as 26 bushels to each acre. The wheat is of the finest quality, being as beautiful grain as ever seen and perfectly clean. When offered for seed, farmers are requested to call and examine it.

Marshall County News

From the Warren Sheaf.

There is not an idle man in Warren. The accustomed dry goods loafer, (seen in towns east of the Mississippi river) is an unknown entity in Warren.

In and around our elevators and grain warehouses is a sight to behold. Teams to the right of you; teams to the left of you, horse-teams, mule-teams, ox-teams, teams, teams everywhere loaded with the golden grain.

The present season in a good one in which to get out of debt. The past year has taught all an importent lesson, and that is not to bank too heavily on the future and make calculations for greater profits than can be realized. The tendency in a new country is to over buy, especially if the purchases can be made on time. The fallacy of this method has been clearly demonstrated and that too in time to save many a one the accumulated labor of years. A good rule to follow is this, never buy an article unless you need it, and pay for it when you get it. Of course, there come occasionally, an exception to this rule, but don't make the exceptions the rule. You will be happier in the end if you follow this rule.

98 cars of this years crop of wheat have been shipped from Warren distributed among the grain houses here as follows:

Sterrett Elevator	Co.,	42	cars.
P. & H.	"	"	30	"
Woodward	"	"	13	"
Mill Co.,	"	"	13	"

Besides the above there is in store at the Woodward Elevator 35,000 bushels, at the Mill elevator 25,000 bushels, at W. H. Gilbertс ware house 7,000, at the Sterrett Elevator Co., 4,000, and the P. & H. Elevator Co., ware house 3,000, awaiting cars for shipment. The above shows what has been done here in way of handling wheat the past three weeks and to our way of thinking, a pretty good showing. The above figures show that at least 125,000 bushels have already been bought at this market, and they have but just begun buying. It will only be a few weeks before 500,000 bushels will have been bought at this point alone. 125,000 bushels at 85 cents per bushel amounts to $106,250 which has been paid out to farmers in this immediate vicinity, and when the 500,000 bushels shall have been marketed $425,000 will represent the little bundle of Greenbacks distributed to the tillers of the soil. Such is farming in the Red River Valley in a season of drouth.

From the Argyle Banner.

There are now sixteen organized townships in this county.

There are five genuine candidates for the office of sheriff in this county. Four of whom reside at Warren.

The Leader says that P. A. Dufour made Stephen a professional visit last week and broke one of the strings on the bass viol. In consequence of which the dance was postponed one week.

Wheat No. 1 hard, 85.

A. J. Clark is stopping at Stephen this week. His health is very poor lately, and he thinks rest will improve him.

Mr. Bivins of Stephen made us a pleasant call on Tuesday last. He reports everything in a flourishing condition at that place.

How is this for high. There has been received for shipment at this place 75,000 bushels of wheat this season, and the amount is increasing rapidly.

Fred Puhler, who went up the spout operating the Brainerd Dispatch is about to start a daily newspaper in St. Paul. We have never met Fred but we recollect of having heard several of his wails last fall while he was turning the crank of Kindred's Alert at Ada.

Hector Goulet, a farmer residing near this place, had the misfortune to loose by fire about 600 bushels of wheat on Monday last. The fire was caused by the steam thresher. The machine had just been hauled to the stacks, and while the crew were at dinner the engine set fire to four stacks. They were entirely consumed. The machine was saved. We look upon this burning as sheer carelessness on the port of the operators of the machine.

The sickest looking man in town, one day last week, was constable Stolz. He was ordered to take a prisoner to Crookston, by Justice Barker, as we have no jail in this county. While the constable was trying on that fine new suit of clothes and shining up his new tin star, both of which he purchased especially for the occasion, the prisoner vamoosed, that is made himself scarce, and has not been seen since. The constable returned the tin star but kept the suit of clothes.

Civilizing The Indian.

As we were going down the N. P. R. R. last Friday, we met Father Teliow, who was on his way to Fehanville, Ill., having in charge thirty Sioux boys, ranging from twelve to twenty years old. Father Teliow was taking these boys to St. Mary's Training school at that place where they will remain for three years. The school is a Catholic institution and has 440 acres of land on which to give lessons in farming. During half of each day the boys will receive instructions in reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, etc., during the other half day will be taught farming. About twenty boys were to join this party at St. Paul, from the Devil's Lake Agency. Among the party was a son of Sitting Bull aged about twenty years. Educating the savage child is the way to civilize the Indian, and Father Teliow will undoubtedly meet with gratifying results.

What's in a Name?

"Three large bears were ushered into the "animal kingdom" the other morning by Joe Barthlammel, of Crookstown."

The above astounding item is taken from the Stoughton Hub, a Wisconsin paper. In our issue of Sept. 20th we mentioned that Joe Barthiaume had killed three bears and the Hub doubtless takes its item from that. Joe is now wondering what they will call him when the item gets as far as New York if the adjoining State butchers him in such a reckless manner.

A VICTIM TO WHISKY.

From the Norman County Index.

Last Monday evening shortly before 6 o'clock, as John Malan and the section crew were returning home from work they found the dead body of a man about one-half mile below the Wild Rice River. The coroner was notified, who went down on a hand car and brought the corpse to this city. Persons in this city identified the deceased as M. Arstad, a man who had been in and about the city during the past week. Arstad came to Ada early last week from the thirteen townships and while in the city drank very heavily, being continually drunk. Monday morning about 7 o'clock he had a fit on the street near the passenger depot, at which time his condition attracted attention, but after recovering from the fit he denied feeling unwell. During the morning he made inquiries in regard to the distance to Glyndon, and shortly afterward departed in that direction. About 12 o'clock he was seen by Louis Hanson a short distance below Bowman's place, which is about a mile from the city. When seen he was lying near the roadside and appeared as if drunk. Mr. Hanson asked him what he was doing there, whereupon Arstad raised up and looked at him, and then sank back without replying and groaned. This was probably the last seen of him alive. When Malan found him he was lying on his face with his hand under his head, and was lying about two feet from the track. Mr. Malan said he had passed the spot where deceased was found about 2 o'clock and was certain he was not there at that time; and also that he had not been injured by the cars. An inquest was held Tuesday morning, at which the evidense given was in accordance with the above. After hearing the facts the jury returned a verdict as follows:

We find that M. Arstad's death was caused by a fit, which was brought about by the excessive use of intoxicating liquor.

Monday night Coroner Koyl telegraphed to the chief of police at Fergus Falls asking him to notify M. Arstad's friends. Tuesday a reply was received with instructions to do what was seen fit with the body. Accordingly the body was buried Tuesday afternoon in the city cemetery.

A Little Story of the Great War.

Fredericksburg Free Standard.

"The lodge of Masons in which George Washington was "initiated, passed and raised," Fredericksburg, No. 4, was pillaged in 1862; when that town was attacked by hostile soldiery, the lodge safe blown open and the records, regalia, jewels, etc., carried off. Among the articles taken was an old jewel of solid silver in the form of a "level," highly prized by the lodge for its antiquity. The old relic was recently discovered by the secretary of Integrity Lodge, No. 158, A. F. and A. M., of Philadelphia, in the safe of that lodge, where it had been deposited for safe keeping during the war by a former member of Integrity lodge, who had recovered it from a soldier who acknowledged having taken it from the lodge room No. 4. A note tacked to the jewel required its delivery to No. 4, "when the State of Virginia should cease to be in open rebellion against the authority of the government of the United States." The jewel was returned last week to lodge No. 4."

The threshers are very busy and men are still scarce.

Mr. Ohmer, the railroad eating house boss, assumed the management of hotel Oakland at Kennedy last Wednesday.

The country around Hallock is well dotted by wheat stacks, hay stacks and new houses; signs of prosperity on every hand.

Mr. A. Walter of the Burkhardt brewery at Crookston, was is Hallock Wednesday looking after his interests. He reports an increasing business all along the line.

Some of the Roseau Lake Indians had a splendid Moose head, prepared for the taxidermist. They only asked a few (6) dollars for the head; as usual the editor was short or we would have taken it in.

On Sunday night, at hotel Nelson, a man while looking at his shot gun accidently discharged the load in a crowded room, but luckily it passed through window curtains and glass, doing no further damage.

Mr. Peter Pauli has the highest average yet, 23½ per acre, out of the half bushel measure at the threshing machine, that we have heard of. This shows, as Mr. Pauli says, that thorough cultivation will pay.

Capt. Donaldson has been solicited to send a sample of his wheat to Washington with a view of distributing it for seed among other farmers (through the National Bureau of Agriculture) in order to encourage the growth of the best No. 1 hard wheat in new districts now being opened up.

Every day long rows of wagons are to be seen waiting their turns to unload at the elevator. Wheat is coming in very fast, still many are holding back for a rise in prices and expect to get a dollar per bushel before the holidays for the finest wheat yet raised (as a rule) in the Red River valley. We hope their wishes may be realized.

We are informed by Capt. Donaldson that his wheat on the large farm will not be over 15 bushels per acre on the entire land seeded, but he has pieces that run as high as 26 bushels to each acre. The wheat is of the finest quality, being as beautiful grain as ever seen and perfectly clean. When offered for seed, farmers are requested to call and examine it.

Marshall County News

From the Warren Sheaf.

There is not an idle man in Warren. The accustomed dry goods loafer, (seen in towns east of the Mississippi river) is an unknown entity in Warren.

In and around our elevators and grain warehouses is a sight to behold. Teams to the right of you; teams to the left of you, horse-teams, mule-teams, ox-teams, teams, teams everywhere loaded with the golden grain.

The present season in a good one in which to get out of debt. The past year has taught all an importent lesson, and that is not to bank too heavily on the future and make calculations for greater profits than can be realized. The tendency in a new country is to over buy, especially if the purchases can be made on time. The fallacy of this method has been clearly demonstrated and that too in time to save many a one the accumulated labor of years. A good rule to follow is this, never buy an article unless you need it, and pay for it when you get it. Of course, there come occasionally, an exception to this rule, but don't make the exceptions the rule. You will be happier in the end if you follow this rule.

98 cars of this years crop of wheat have been shipped from Warren distributed among the grain houses here as follows:

Sterrett	Elevator	Co.,	42	cars.
P. & H.	"	"	30	"
Woodward	"	"	13	"
Mill Co.,	"	"	13	"

Besides the above there is in store at the Woodward Elevator 35,000 bushels, at the Mill elevator 25,000 bushels, at W. H. Gilcorts ware house 7,000, at the Sterrett Elevator Co., 4,000, and the P. & H. Elevator Co., ware house 3,000, awaiting cars for shipment. The above shows what has been done here in way of handling wheat the past three weeks and to our way of thinking, a pretty good showing. The above figures show that at least 125,000 bushels have already been bought at this market, and they have but just begun buying. It will only be a few weeks before 500,000 bushels will have been bought at this point alone. 125,000 bushels at 85 cents per bushel amounts to $106,250 which has been paid out to farmers in this immediate vicinity, and when the 500,000 bushels shall have been marketed $425,000 will represent the little bundle of Greenbacks distributed to the tillers of the soil. Such is farming in the Red River Valley in a season of drouth.

From the Argyle Banner.

There are now sixteen organized townships in this county.

There are five genuine candidates for the office of sheriff in this county. Four of whom reside at Warren.

The Leader says that P. A. Dufour made Stephen a professional visit last week and broke one of the strings on the bass viol. In consequence of which the dance was postponed one week.

Wheat No. 1 hard, 85.

A. J. Clark is stopping at Stephen this week. His health is very poor lately, and he thinks rest will improve him.

Mr. Bivins of Stephen made us a pleasant call on Tuesday last. He reports everything in a flourishing condition at that place.

How is this for high. There has been received for shipment at this place 75,000 bushels of wheat this season, and the amount is increasing rapidly.

Fred Puhler, who went up the spout operating the Brainerd Dispatch is about to start a daily newspaper in St. Paul. We have never met Fred but we recollect of having heard several of his wails last fall while he was turning the crank of Kindred's Alert at Ada.

Hector Goulet, a farmer residing near this place, had the misfortune to loose by fire about 600 bushels of wheat on Monday last. The fire was caused by the steam thresher. The machine had just been hauled to the stacks, and while the crew were at dinner the engine set fire to four stacks. They were entirely consumed. The machine was saved. We look upon this burning as sheer carelessness on the port of the operators of the machine.

The sickest looking man in town, one day last week, was constable Stolz. He was ordered to take a prisoner to Crookston, by Justice Barker, as we have no jail in this county. While the constable was trying on that fine new suit of clothes and shining up his new tin star, both of which he purchased especially for the occasion, the prisoner vamoosed, that is made himself scarce, and has not been seen since. The constable returned the tin star but kept the suit of clothes.

Civilizing The Indian.

As we were going down the N. P. R. R. last Friday, we met Father Teliow, who was on his way to Fehanville, Ill., having in charge thirty Sioux boys, ranging from twelve to twenty years old. Father Teliow was taking these boys to St. Mary's Training school at that place where they will remain for three years. The school is a Catholic institution and has 440 acres of land on which to give lessons in farming. During half of each day the boys will receive instructions in reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, etc., during the other half day will be taught farming. About twenty boys were to join this party at St. Paul, from the Devil's Lake Agency. Among the party was a son of Sitting Bull aged about twenty years. Educating the savage child is the way to civilize the Indian, and Father Teliow will undoubtedly meet with gratifying results.

LOCAL NEWS.

This is not the finest threshing weather we ever saw.

Our new flouring mills are nearly ready to commence work.

Wheat took a tumble this week, dropping from 86 to 84 cents in two days. It is down to 82 to-day.

A. N. Hopkins & Co. took a lot of their fine buggies and carriages to Red Lake Falls to sell on Tuesday.

Mr. B. Herrick, of Norwich, Chenango Co., N. Y., arrived on Thursday last on a visit to his brother-in-law, Mr. V. D. Carruth.

The Fisher Bulletin has changed hands and Dr. Howard Lancaster is at the helm. It seems to be ably handled.

Thor Haatvedt was in from the thirteen towns on Monday chatting and smiling with his many friends. Thor is town clerk up there.

Dennis Kelley has bought two lots on Cowing Street, in Sletten and Cromb's Addition and will build a residence there immediately. It will make a fine property.

Harry Attix was in from Maple Lake this week looking well and hearty. He reports a yield of 14 bushels of No. 1 Hard wheat and 35 bushels of oats per acre. Injured by drouth.

J. U. Leucke, agent for C. J. Michel, La Crosse, was in the city this week on business. He sold 500 cases of the celebrated La Crosse beer to Ole Bang, who is agent for the company at this place.

Ole Hamery received his commission as Deputy U. S. Land Surveyor, for the District of Minnesota, on Saturday last. He made the occasion one of rejoicing among the boys by setting up some excellent cigars.

Mr. Josiah Ashton, of Red Wing was in the city this week looking us over, piloted by Mr. John Hask, Sr. He is looking for a suitable point for investments and is enthusiastic over our fair thriving young city.

Ole Bang, Lawyer Reilly, John Anundson, and a squad of boys went down to the Sand Hill River, fishing duck-ing etc. etc. They report a good time but we didn't see any fish, ducks or geese when they returned.

We have seen a copy of the Graceville Transcript, Mr. A. Dewey's latest venture. It appears to be well patronized, and we should judge that Mr. Dewey has struck a bonanza. We heartily wish him abundant success.

Mr. B. St. Aubin, an old and wealthy citizen of St. Paul, come up to visit his mother and see our thriving young city this week. He was so well pleased with what he saw of our city that he gave instructions to Mr. Filiatrault to keep on the watch for good investments in real estate for him.

On the 6th of Oct., Peter Cornelius united for life Mr. T. C. Toreson and Miss G. I. Hagsett, all of this great County of Polk and State of Minnesota. Many of the friends of the bride and groom were present to witness the interesting ceremonies and partake of the festivities of the occasion which, we are told was a bang up affair.

Several tired individuals were lingering about in the classic shades in front of C. C. Utzinger's place on Saturday evening when one of their number, more tired than the rest, sat down to rest himself upon the brow of the window sill which gave way so easily that they were all surprised to see their comrade take a tumble to himself inside. Rising to examine the cause thereof he fell into the hands of the ever vigilant cop, who cast him into prison from whence he was in due time haled before the Judge. The Judge, being an austere man ordered the weary traveler to pony up for the damages, also to deposit a small amount of silver metal in the archives of the city, otherwise to be conveyed back to the place from whence he was taken by the officers of the law there to expiate in durance vile to the full extent of his crimes. The tired individual put up the wherewithal and departed a sadder and a more rested man.

Our band leader, Fred Walker, was sent for to go to Grand Forks on Tuesday to play at the races.

Mrs. Charles Churchill leaves to-night for her old home at Logansport, Ind. She intends to spend the winter under the parental roof.

Rev. T. J. West was in from his farm at Union Lake this week. He has succeeded in getting a fine colony located up there in the thirteen townships.

John McLean is putting up a building on his lot adjoining lawyer Pierce's office, on Broadway. It will be occupied by Ives & Hatlestad as a law and real estate office.

At the sale of horses last Saturday the horses all went cheap. Tom Bjoin secured a rattling trotter for $125 and is ow ready to pass under the wire a neck ahead or thereabouts.

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Palmer, of Angus are visiting with friends in the city this week. J. M. reports a yield of 12 bushels of wheat per acre. He sold in Duluth his wheat netting him 89 cents at Angus on Oct. 4th.

Geo. J. McManus has returned from an exploring trip to the thirteen townships and now if you want to know more about that country than he can tell you you will have to guess it. Go and interview him about it.

A young Norwegian girl, named Minnie Johnson, employed as a domestic in the family of Mr. Louis Fontaine, died this week and was buried on Monday. We are told that she had no relatives in this country.

A postal card which we have received from Ringling Bros., states that their "Carnival of Fun Company" will appear in this city on Oct. 24th. This company consists of 11 star artists 3 commedians, 3 soloists a song and dance team, a sketch team a band and orchestra.

Jack Williams, barkeeper at the Odd saloon has fallen on hard lines. He yielded to the temptation to decamp with an overcoat and $100, but we are told, was arrested at Grand Forks on a telegram from Sheriff Zwickey. Jack is old enough to have known better.

Rev. W. C. Beebe, the Presbyterian pastor who will have charge of the Presbyterian churches at St. Hilaire and Red Lake Falls arrived on Saturday from Edwinboro, Pa. Mr. B. is a genial gentleman and appears to be just the right kind of a man for a pioneer pastor.

The band concert on Monday evening was well attended and highly enjoyed by all. Every part was excellently wel sustained showing that Crookston does not have to go abroad to find material for a No. 1 concert. Almost every piece was heartily encored showing a keen appreciation by the audience. We trust that it will be repeated at an early date.

Eugene Crain, a former comp in the JOURNAL office gave us a pleasant call on Sunday, evening, en route to accept a "sit" on the Grand Forks Herald. "Gene" reported that along the line of the N. P. from Duluth to Glyndon the farmers have their fall plowing nearly completed—that at Brainerd the N. P. Hospital is nearly finished and that the N. P. is building a fine depot at Wadena.

At the M. E. Conference which closed its session at St. Paul on Tuesday the following appointments were made by Bishop Simpson: Rev. A. W. Edwards. who has labored so acceptably among us for the past year, goes to Mankato. and the Rev. J. F. Zeigler is appointed in his stead at Crookston. Rev. C. B. Brecount, a former pastor here, goes to St. Vincent and Pembina, and Rev. J. W. Klepper goes to Mandon, D. T.

Every experienced farmer in the county has before this attended to the matter of protection against prairie fires, which at this time of the year have a bad habit of running about. If there are any who have not been here long enough to appreciate what those prairie fires mean we should advise such to lose no time in plowing about exposed haystacks or buildings and to do it effectually. Time spent in such pre-cautions is well spent.

Eugene B. Clark came in from the town of Lambert, on Tuesday with a load of wheat for market. Mr. Clark has to haul his wheat forty miles and says that knocks the profits entirely off of wheat-raising. That country needs a railroad. Mr. C., came into the office to order the JOURNAL, saying that while they could manage to get along somehow without a railroad he could not think of trying to do without the county paper.

Accompanied by Judge R. Reynolds we rode out on Tuesday to Phil Porger's place to see the improvements being made on the Judge's water power at that place and must confess that we never had an adequate idea before of the capabilities or magnitude of that proposed improvement. At a comparatively trifling expense a dam can be constructed that will afford hundreds of horse power and the same dam can be made to flood a large slough which will afford boomage for millions of feet of logs. The work now being done there is in reference to the boom project. It is intended to put ten feet of water in the slough which will give 75 acres of boomage. The project is indeed a grand one and is well calculated to place Crookston in the front ranks of manufacturing cities of the State, if carried out and the Judge is in dead earnest in the matter and is determined to see it carried out. We shall watch this work with interest and later will be able to give some important facts in connection therewith.

Prairie Fire.

We are told that a big prairie fire swept over the country seven miles west of town, last week, destroying a large dwelling house, stables, a self-binder, a grain separator and several plows belonging to Mr. Carlos Clough. Mr. Clough is living up in the thirteen towns and there was no one in the house that burned and not a furrow plowed to protect it. "A stitch in time saves nine," is a saying as true as it is old.

The Veteran Thresher comes to the Front.

Uncle Daniel Cameron, the veteran thresher of Polk Co., has just finished threshing E. S. Corser's big job. Mr. C. reports that with a Buffalo Pitts 40 inch separator, (which is five years in the field) he threshed in just ten hours time, 1775 bushels of wheat, and in 8 hours and 15 minutes he pounded out 2587 bushels of oats. He challenges a better record.

CLIMBING VESUVIUS.

Interesting Account of an Ascent of Italy's Great Volcano—A Peep Into the Bowels of the Earth.

"One day of our stay in Naples was sent apart for a visit to Vesuvius," writes Dr. Plant, of Troy, N. Y., who is in Europe to his father. "To avoid as much as possible the excessive heat of midday, we had given orders to be called at 5 a. m. Our breakfast was as usual. A continental breakfast is "without variableness or shadow of turning," consisting of bread, coffee, and wafers of fresh butter. We have, though,—come to think of it,—been two or three times served with strained honey. At 6:15 we started—a company of eighteen or twenty, in a quarter as many carriages. For three or four miles, at least, our route lay along the crescent shore of the city, or, I believe, in any other European city. Men, women, and children utterly unkempt and uncared for; bare-footed and dirty-legged; faces unwashed and hair uncombed, all about the streets, walking, sitting, reclining; many of them munching their breakfast of black bread and figs; sidewalks unmentionably filthy, and clouds of dust, rising from the unsprinkled streets—that is the picture that any one will recognize who has ever been in Naples. Pailent, forbidding, plodding, little donkeys, hardly larger than a Newfoundland dog, were going cityward, all covered up with their immense panniers or baskets of vegetables and fruits. They are seldom driven by reins as are our horses, but the master or perhaps mistress, walks behind him and holds on by the tail. A donkey's tail is an institution in itself. It is the rudder that guides him. A little twist this way or that way turns the whole body. An admonitory pinch makes him go faster. A spiteful wrench assures him that his master is mad and he brays, while a gentle squeeze, a tender pressure, tells him that all is well, and he jogs contentedly along, willing to bear any burden and endure hardships so that he may stand approved at headquarters, which, curiously, are at the tail end.

"Our progress was slow. The Naples horses are poor, dispirited, and abused. Their protruding ribs show a lack of oats, and their seamed skins an overuse of the lash. The Italians appear to be very fond of using the whip on their beasts.

"Turning at last from the long, doleful street, we began to climb the mountain. The scent is made by wagon and railroad. Both are good and the cost of construction must have been enormous. The whole business is in charge of the Vesuvius company, which is not the Neapolitan, or even Italian, but Belgian. The wagon road is zigzag; more crooked than the trail of an earthworm in the sand after a shower. Our progress was something like a crab's, more lateral than forward. Still we do go forward and upward, though at a snails' pace. The base of the great mountain, which is thirty miles in circumference, is a garden of vines and fruit trees, figs, pomegranates, and olives abound. Thousands and tens of thousands of people live in little white cottages, nearer than were Pompeii and Herculaneum, hugging the mountain, so to speak, forgetful, apparently, of its power to destroy. The great eruption of a few years ago did destroy one little village, but hardly had the ground cooled and the smoke cleared away when these home-loving people began to build on the same site, and it is now as flourishing as before.

"Though the base of the mountain is lovely and rich with blossom and fruit, we soon come to a scene as desolate as can be imagined. Great fields of dark brown almost black lava, cover most of the mountain side. Its surface is not uniform, but extremely irregular and nodular, and it is easy to see how it has become so. The liquid lava is a thick substance, something like pitch, and usually moves slowly. Any obstruction as an uneven surface retards the stream; the lower edge cools and becomes thicker, increasing the obstruction, and there results an accumulation—a bunching up of the lava at this point. There are multitudes of these hammocks, with wavy outlines on the lower side where the liquid has solidified. The appearance is much as we may imagine would be that of solid black billows. As the lava cools another phenomena occurs; that is, fissuring. The more recent beds are full of unsightly gashes, running cross-wise, wide enough and deep enough often to take one in all over. But lava is not a very stable product; it tends disintregate by exposure, and in the older beds it has crumbled down into something like a uniform moss. I have somewhere read that it makes an excellent fertillizer, but over all these acres of lava-covered soil there is no sign of vegatation. The scene is the very 'blackness of desolation.'

"The cone is distinct from the mountain in the sense that a dome is distinct from the building which it surrounds. It is very steep, and something like a third of a mile in height. Near the base fo the cone stands the observatory on a spur of the mountain. In the great eruption some years ago the river of molten lava divided just above this point, a branch running down on either side of the observatory. Here, Palmieri, the hero of Vesuvious, watched and signaled the process to those below. It must have been a hot place, that observatory, with a river of sulphurous lava almost grazing it on either side.

"Though the mountain-top is probably not more than six miles from our hotel in Naples, our actual travel had been far more than that, and it was 11 o'clock before we reached the restaurant and railroad station at the foot of the cone. Deciding to lunch before going further, our tables were spread under a verandah overlooking a scene of great extent and matchless beauty. Below us was the mountain, vine-clad at its base, but with acres on acres of dark disfiguring masses of lava immediately before us; yonder the city, with its outlying villages; on the other side of the Bay Sorronto, sitting between hills couered to their summitts with olive and orange trees; in the Rocky island of Cabril, with its wonderful blue Grotto; and farther out, but within plain sight, the classic island of Ischia, lately the scene of a disaster so appalling as to call for sympathy and generous gifts from every land. All the landscape was suffused with a hazy azure, and the bay from this height appeared to a part of the sky, and some of us had to look more than once to assure ourselves that the boats were not huge birds. Nothing that I had ever seen seemed so much like an enchantment.

"The inclined railway is over two thousand feet long and runs nearly to the summit of the cone. It is exceedingly steep, and in making the ascent the timid should look upward, never downward. I think it must be hard for anyone to resist the thought that with a lively volcano just over one's head and four thousand feet of steep mountain below something might occur that would necessitate an unpleasant cablegram to one's friends on the other side.

"The ascent gained, we were beset by the guides who pressed their service upon us to the tune of 5 francs for each person. Some of our party offered them 2 or 3 francs, but this they would not accept. So, resolving to become independent tourists, we started out by ourselves, or rather a part did so, for some preferred not to go beyond the terminus of the railroad.

"The top of the cone is quite a large space; I should think as much as three or four acres. The crater has been somewhat given to shifting its place within this area. At present it is rather to one side of it. Though its edges are considerable higher than the general surface of the summit, there is one point a few rods away so elevated that one stands upon it and look over into the vortex whence issue steam and smoke, and tufts of lava, and hisses, and puffs, and sometimes thunderings. We judged the crater to be about forty feet across. Looking into it was something like looking into a furnace chimney when the heat was on. While the escape of the steam and smoke was constant, every few moments there was a spiteful puff and noise as if something had given way below, and a shower of bits of lava that fell around the base. These the guides, still hovering around us like carrion-birds around a carcass, would run for and drop a penny into them while still plastic, and when cool put them on the market for a franc each. I should say that the stream of lava does not come from the crater at present but from the side of the cone some hundreds of feet below it.

"The top of the cone—the area—is not blackish brown, as are the sides; it is in all shades from orange red to a pale lemon. This is owing to deposits of sulphur coming not only from the crater but from many fissures that open here and there. From these hot sulphurous gases rise that are extremely irritating to the air passages if breathed. Some of these fissures were so hot that I could not hold my hand over them. The entire summit was overwarm to the feet, and when I had stood looking into the vortex the heat underfoot was too great to be endured long.

"In one place I found what seemed to be an independent crater. Though small, it had set up business on its own account. It was a hole about the size of a half-bushel measure and out of it a hot brimstone-laden air was rushing as if it were a rent-role for the infernal regions. Its sides looked like the fire-box of a long-used stove. A large chunk of lava thrown into it gave no answer back, showing that though not large, it was deep. I spent considerable time in going over this fissured and scarred and sulphur-covered summit. In many places my tread brought a hollow sound, showing that I was walking on a crust and admonishing to gentle foot-falls.

"There was a cool breeze blowing, as I suppose there a ways is from the draft of the carter and the rising of hot air. Otherwise the heat would have been most oppressive and the sulphurous emanations stifling.

"Wishing to get something nearer the great vortex than I had yet been, I began the ascent toward it. The heat was almost too much for my feet, but I had got within a few yards of it and stood thinking whether I could venture further when there was a sudden loud report, followed by a rush of smoke and a shower of lava chunks, throwing some of them to a distance beyond where I was standing. My reception had not been so cordial as to prompt to a closer interview, and I came away rather precipitately. The other members of the company had gone down to the railroad station some time before, and with some chunks of warm lava stones in my hands that I shall try to get to America, I left rather reluctantly one of the most notable spots I can ever hope to see."

Nights With Uncle Remus.

A Ghost Story.

The next time the little boy visited Uncle Remus, he persuaded 'Tildy to go in with him. Daddy Jack was in his usual place dozing and talking to himself, while Uncle Remus oiled the carriage harness. After awhile Aunt Temby came in.

The conversation turned on ghosts and after some general discussion of the subject Tildy broke the silence.

"W'en it come ter tales 'bout ha'nt's," said she "I hear tell 'er one dat'll des natally make de kinks on yo' head onquite deyse'f."

"W'at tale dat, chile?" asked Aunt Temby.

"Unk' Remus, mus' I tell it?"

"Let her come in," said Uncle Remus.

'Well, den'" said 'Tildy, rolling her eyes back and displaying her white teeth, "one time dey wuz a 'Oman en a Man. Seem lak dey live close ter one n'er en de Man he shot his eyes on de 'Oman, she des went 'long en ten' ter bizness much tell she tuck'n tuck sick en die. Man, he up'n tell de folks she dead, en de folks dey come en fix'er. Dey lay'er out, en dey light some candles, en dey sot up wid'er, des like folks does now; en dey put two great big roun' shiny dollars on 'er eyes fer ter hol' er eye-leds down."

In describing the silver dollars, 'Tildy joined the end of her thumbs and forefingers together, and made a figure as large as a saucer.

"Dey wuz lots bigger den dollars is deze days," she continued, "en dey looks mighty purty. Seem like dey wuz all de money de 'Oman got, en de folks dey put um on 'er eye-leds fer ter hol' um down. Seem like he know de 'Oman eye-lid stretch wide open lookin' fer 'em. Yit he rattle de money 'roun', en hit rattle loud en hit rattle nice.

"Well, den, de Man, he take'n put de tin box w'at de money in on de mantel-shel-uf. De day go by, en de night come, en w'en night come, de win' 'gun ter rise up en blow. "Man look; no rat dar. He shet up the box, en set it down on de shel-uf. Time he do dat yer come de fuss—clinkity, clinkity, clinkalinkle! Man open de box en look at de money. Dem two silver dollars layin' in dar des like he put um. W'iles de man dun dis, look like he kin year sump'n say' way off yander:

"Whar my money? Oh, give me my money!"

"Man, he sot de box back on de shel-uf, en time he put it down he year de money rattle—clinkity, clinkalinkle, clink—en dem fum way off yander sump'n say:

"Oh, gim me my money! I want my money!"

"Well, den, de man git skeer'd sho nuff, en he got er flat inn en put on de tin box, en den run en jump in de bed. He des know dey's a booger comin'. Time he git in bed en kivver his head, de money rattle louder, en sump'n cry 'way off yander:

"Man, he shake en he shiver; money, hit clink en rattle; booger hit hooler en cry. Booger come closter, money clink louder, Man shake wusser. Money say 'Clinkty, clinkalinkle!' Booger cry, 'Oh, gim'me money, money. Man holler, "Oh, Lordy, Lordy!"

"Well, den, hit keep on dis away, tell dreckly Man year de do' open. He been fum und' de kivver, en in walk de 'Oman w'at he done bury in de buryin' groun.' Man shive! en shiver, win' blow en blow, money rattle en rattle. 'Oman y en cry. 'Buzz-zoo-o-o-o!' sez de win'; 'clink, clink!' sez de box; 'Oh, gim me my money!' sez de 'Oman; 'Oh, Lordy" says de Man. 'Oman year de money, but look like she aint can see, en she grope 'roun' wid er han' h'st in de a'r des dis away."

Here Tildy stood up, pushed her chair back with her foot, raised her arms over her head, and leaned forward in the direction of Daddy Jack.

"Win' blow, fier flicker, money rattle, Man shake en shiver, 'Oman grope 'roun', en say, 'Gim me my money! Oh, who got my money?"

'Tildy advanced a few steps.

"Money, look like it gwine ter t'ar de tin box all ter flinders. 'Oman grope en cry, grope en cry, tell bimeby she jump on de man en holler:

" 'You got my money!' "

As she reached this climax, 'Tildy sprang at Daddy Jack and seized him, and for a few moments there was considerable confusion in the corner. The little boy was frightened, but the collapsed appearance of Daddy Jack convulsed him with laughter. The old African was very angry. His little eyes glistened with momentry malice, and he shook his cane threateningly at 'Tildy. The latter coolly adjusted her ear-rings, as she exclaimed:

"Dar, now! I know'd I'd git even wid de ole vilyun. Come a-callin' me pidjin-toed!"

"Better keep yo' eye on 'im, chile," said Aunt Tempy. "He 'witch you, sho."

"Witch who? Ef he come witchin' 'roun' me I lay I break his back. I tell you dat, right pine-blank."

A Jewel of a Servant.

From Texas Siftings.

A gentleman in Austin has a new servant, and the other day he undertook to teach him in regard to certain creditors who invariably hounded him the first of each month with aggravating bills.

"Now," said he to his servant, "if a man should call for me to-day, you tell him I am not at home."

"Yis, sor," replied the man.

"Fearing a misunderstanding in some way, he again said:—

"Now, Pat, what will you tell the man when he calls?"

"Tell him I am not at home, sor."

"No, no, blockhead, tell him that I, myself, am not at home."

"All roight, sor."

"Now, what will you say to him?"

"I, myself am not at home."

"Pshaw! Tell him your boss is not in. Understand that donkey? Now, what will you say?"

"Your boss is not in. Understand that, donkey?"

"Fool! That's not right. Say to him, "I am out." Can you do that?"

"Yis, sor?"

"Well, let's hear you."

"I am out."

"Thunderation! Can't you understand? Tell him your master is out. Now, what will you say?"

"Your master is out."

"No, you don't say anything of the kind, you ignoramus. Tell the man that I have left the house."

"Certainly, I'll tell him that I have left the house, but he won't belave me when he sees me in the house."

"Pshaw! Can't you simply say I have gone out for a walk?"

"Thin he'll think I am a lying, sor."

"How so?"

"Why, whin I tell him I have gone out for a walk—"

"Great Potiphar? You are the stupidest fool I ever knew. See here, I don't want to see any of the people that will call to-day, and I want them to understand that there's no use of them calling as they won't find me at home. Can you give them an ambiguous answer in your own words?"

"Is it an ambiguous answer? I should say I could, if you jist lave it to me?"

"Well, what will you say?"

"I'll say, when they ax me if you are in: 'Yis, the boss is in, but he has committed bigamy and gone off on a weddin' tour wid a widdy woman, an' if they don't arrest him for the ambiggity rez 'ill niver see the color av his hair again.' That'll fetch 'em."

The Luzerne Legal Register says: "The new law in Kentucky, fixing one mile as the legal distance between a church and saloon, was passed for the purpose of ascertaining how rapidly a Kentuckian can get over the ground. Some great bursts of speed are reported as having occurred."

They kiss and stand on the doorsteps twenty minutes in the rain. "Sarah, it's so good to see you; how have you been?" "O, ever so nice; have gained twelve pound in seven weeks." "And how is your husband?" "O, he's all right; out every day; the very picture of malaria." —Hartford Journal.

THE FATHER OF FISH CULTURE.

Seth Green's Ideas About the Finny Tribe and Some of His Varied Experiences.

(Turf, Field and Farm.)

"How did you ever come to devise this scheme?"

"I have been working at it ever since I was large enough to bend a pin."

The above remark was addressed to Mr. Seth Green, the veteran fish culturist, who is known to the entire world, and his reply indicates the extent of his labors.

"When I was quite young," he continued, "I would lie on the limbs of trees that reached out over the water entire afternoons watching the movements of the fish and studying their habits. In this way I discovered many characteristics which were before unknown. I saw, as every observer must see, the destructive elements that are warring against fish, and I realized that unless something were done, the life in the streams of this country would become extinct. To counteract this disastrous end became my life work, and I am happy to say I have seen its accomplishment."

"Were you successful on the start?"

"No, indeed. Up to that time all artificial attempts to hatch and raise fish from the spawn had failed, and I was compelled to experiment in an entirely new manner. The work was a careful and tedious one, but I finally succeeded and to-day I am able to hatch and raise fully seventy-five per cent. of all spawn."

"Enormous! Why that is a larger percentage than either the vegetable or animal kingdoms produce in a natural condition."

"I knew it, but we exercise the greatest care in the start, and guard the little fellows until they become able to care for themselves."

The foregoing conversation occurred at Caledonia where the representative of this paper was paying a visit to the state fish hatcheries. It has been his privilege to report very many interesting sights within the past twenty-five years, but the view presented here exceeds in interest anything ever before attempted.

"How many fish are there in those ponds, Mr. Green?"

"As we have never attempted to count them it will be impossible to say. They extend way up into millions though. We shipped over three millions cut of the pond this year and there seemed to be as many afterward as before. We have nearly every variety of the trout family and many hybrids.

"You speak of hybrids, Mr. Green, What do you mean by that?"

"I have experimented for years in crossing the breed of the various fish and I am still working upon it. We cross the female salmon trout with the male brook trout, and thus produce a hybrid. Then we cross the hybrid with the brook trout, which gives us three-quarter brook trout and one-quarter salmon trout. This makes one of the finest fishes in the world. He has all the habits of the brook trout, lives in both streams and lakes, develops vermillion spots on his sides, rises readily to a fly, is far more vigorous and fully one-third larger than the ordinary brook trout of the same age. The possibilities of developmnt in the fish world are great and we are rapidly ascertaining what they are."

As the man of news watched the countenance of Mr. Green while he was giving the above account, he could not but feel that he was in the presence of one of the few investigators who, from a rich and life-long experience, bring great benefit to the world. Let the reader imagine a strong and stalwart frame, surmounted by a head strongly resembling that of Socrates and covered with a white silky beard and luxuriant gray hair. Seth Green, the father of fish culture, is a picture of health, and the reporter could not help remarking so.

"If you had seen me the last winter and spring, young man, you might have thought differently," said the veteran.

"How is that? One would think, to look at you, that sickness was something of which you knew nothing."

"And so it was until last winter. I went down into Florida in the fall to see what kind of fish they had in that state and study their habits and was attacked with malaria in its severest form, and when I came home I realized for the first time in my life, that I was sick. My symptoms were terrible. I had dull, aching pains in my head, limbs and around my back. My appetite was wholly gone, and I felt a lack of energy such as I had often heard described but had never experienced. Any one who has ever had a severe attack of malaria can appreciate my condition. I went to bed and remained there all the spring, and if there ever was a sick man I was the one."

"It seems hardly possible. How did you come to recover so completly."

"My brother, who had been afflicted by a severe kidney trouble and threatened with Bright's disease was completely cured by a remedy in which I had great confidence. I therefore tried the same remedy for my malaria and am happy to say I am a well man to-day and through the instrumentality of Warner's Safe Cure, which I believe to be one of the most valuable of medicines. Indeed, I see it is endorsed by the United States medical college of New York, and that Dr. Gunn, dean of that institution, has written a long article concerning its value."

"And are you now as well as formerly?"

"Apparently so. I keep the remedy on hand all the while though and do not hesitate to recommend it to others."

"One question more. How many ponds of fish have you here and how are they divided.

"Well, we have 43 ponds which are divided up as follows: 22 ponds of brook trout, 2 ponds of salmon trout, 4 of McCloud river or rainbow trout, 2 ponds of German trout, 3 of California mountain trout, 2 ponds of hybrids, 4 of one-quarter salmon and three-quarters brook trout, 2 ponds of gold fish, and 1 pond of carp. Then we have what we call the centennial pond or 'happy family,' consisting of crosses of different fish, including Kennebec salmon, Land Locked salmon, California salmon, brook trout, salmon trout and hybrids. These fish range in size from minnows to 18-pounders, and in age from one-and-one-half months to eleven years. I forgot to say also, that we have a 'hospital' pond, which is entirely empty, which speaks pretty well for a community of many millions. Indeed the whole secret of fish culture can be summed up in four things. Impregnation,—using no water. Plenty of food. Plenty of pure water and cleanliness."

The numerous fish exhibitions which are taking place in all parts of Europe and the unusual interest which is being manifested in this subject throughout the world all owe their origin to the process above described as originated and conducted by Seth Green. It is certainly cause for congratulation to every American that this country produces so many men whose genius brings value to the world, and it is proof positive of the greatest merit that a remedy even with such high standing as Warner's Safe Cure is known to have should be so strongly endorsed and recommended by one so reputable and reliable as Seth Green.

A Cowboy's Reckless Race With a Flying Train.

It was early in the morning that the pilgrims were favored with an exhibition of horsemanship which is rarely seen. At one of the stations at which the train topped there appeared among the knot of natives a veritable cowboy, mounted and fully equipped. He wore a broad-brimmed felt hat over an honest, pleasant face deeply tanned by the sun and atmosphere, a woolen shirt, and short gray jacket and gray pants. Over his legs, from his hips to his knees, extended a wide piece of leather, the object of which is supposed to be to protect him from rain and brush. He was asked if he owned the herd of sheep grazing near, and indignantly responded that he did not—that he was a cowboy.

"Let us see you lasso that cow.

"Huh! that's nothing'; the boys 'd skin my head."

"Then let us see you catch the train."

With a word the little pony was urged to the other side of the track, and, as the train started, horse and rider made a dash going ahead of the train. Gradually, as the train got under way, it gained upon its opponent until it and the horse stood 'neck and neck.' Then as if to tempt the rider to his fate, cigars were handed to him from the car windows. Without a moment's hesitation the little pony was headed for the road-bed, which it reached by a plunge from the higher ground. The train increased in speed, and the cowboy, being intent only upon the prizes offered him, gave the rein to the pony and his attention to taking the cigars from the hands of those inside the cars. Over washouts and uneven grounds, through cuts and over elevations the animal dashed, and so close to the train that the rider's feet came in contact with it. The animal was left entirely to itself, and one misstep or a stumble would have thrown both horse and rider beneath the wheels. For fully three-quarters of a mile the race was kept up, and at the end of it the daring rider was greeteb with shouts which he ackowledged by a wave of his hat as the horse mounted the embankment.—Cor. Swift's Specific

INHERITED IT.—My family all have Scrofula—some mildly, but my case was of the worst type, and resisted all treatment until I used Swift's Specific, which cured me sound and well by forcing all the poison out through the pores of the skin. It is the greatest medicine in the world, and I hope any who doubt will write me here.

E. C. HAWES, Jr., Clarksville, Ga.

After suffering twenty-five years with a painful Dry Tetter, and trying many physicians, I was at last relieved by the use of Swift's Specific, and I cheerfully commend it to all similarly afflicted.

BAD, BAD, BAD BLOOD.

Some blood is bad because it is poor and weak. Some is bad because it contains impurities. Some men have such bad blood that the wonder is it does not poison the mosquitoes who come to bite them.

The rich red color of good blood is owing to the iron which is present. Blood which has not enough iron in it is always unsatisfactory. The person in whose veins it circulates cannot be said to enjoy good health.

The efforts of expert chemists to produce a preparation of iron which can be assimilated with the blood have resulted in that perfect preparation which is an important part of Brown's Iron Bitters. It is the only one which freely enters into the blood. It is the only one which accomplishes the desired good

Weak, poor, thin blood may be made rich and strong, and impure blood may be purified by the use of that Great Iron Medicine, Brown's Iron Bitters.

MUSINGS (AS IT WERE.)

Loving the graceful willows
Shelter the old gray mill,
And—ye gods! but whence come the money
To settle my tailor's bill?

Over the sky, rain-dripping.
The golden rainbow is bent,
And to-morrow, O golden rainbow,
I must fix up my last month's rent.

Over the daisy-decked meadows
The dear lambs are frisking gay,
And speaking of sheep reminds me
Of the butcher's bill due to-day.

In the blossom fields of clover
The cattle are lowing low,
And my milk bill is ripe to-morrow,
Which gives me pain to know.

The blue-bells are blossoming sweetly,
And sweetly the blue birds sing,
And I think of my wife and the unpaid bill
For the bonnet she got last spring.

THE SECRET SIN.

BY J. WM. VAN NAMEE, M. D.

From the Yankee Blade.

Emily Leslie was beautiful—her eyes were blue and dreamy—not of that soulless, mistified blue, so often seen, but of a dark, sparkling, yet dreamy blue. Her hair hung in ringlets over her brow and shoulders with witching grace, like sunlight on a meadow, they fell upon her shoulders like sunbeams on the leaf of some pure lily; her brow was high and fair, her cheeks like the blush of some wild prairie rose, and her teeth were even and white as the pearls she twined among her ringlets, half hidden beneath lips red as cherries.

Emily was an only child—and an acknowledged belle. A cousin resided with her parents—an orphan, left in childhood to the care and protection of Mr. and Mrs. Leslie.

Elsie Turner was a wild, gentle and affectionate girl—modest and retiring in demeanor; she was plain, yet beautiful; she never mingled in the gay scenes of which Emily was the light and life, her feet never tripped through the mazes of the dance in the brilliantly lighted ball room, she preferred to remain at home and hold communion with some celebrated author, for she was something of a book worm.

It was the evening on which the most brilliant ball of the season was to be given. Emily's dress had just arrived from the dressmaker's, and was thrown over the back of a chair in her dressing room; her jewel case lay open upon her dressing table, and various articles that go to make up a lady's toilet were distributed around the room; Emily, herself, sat in an easy chair before her mirror, a loose wrapper of rich, dark velvet was thrown carelessly over her, and Elsie stood by her side drawing the comb through her locks of rich brown hair.

"I wish this terrible headache would leave me," said Emily, with a weary, indolent sigh. "I fear, if it continues, I shall not be able to join the evening's entertainment. Elsie, dear, will you bring me a tablespoonful of brandy in a glass, and put a little sugar and water with it? Be sure and do not put more than a tablespoonful of the brandy in, I have taken one dose this afternoon."

Elsie laid the comb down upon the dressing-table, and left the room to comply with the request; a shadow rested upon her brow, and, as she descended the staircase, she murmured:

"Alas! I fear Emily is contracting a habit she will find it difficult to break herself of. I know this ceaseless round of gayety wears upon her, but this resorting to stimulants to produce life and energy will grow upon her. Poor girl! she does not see the probable consequences of this evil habit; would that I could convince her of her error."

Elsie procured the brandy, and prepared it according to directions, and returned to the chamber of her cousin.

Emily took the glass and drank the contents; as she returned the glass to Elsie, she said:

"There, I feel better already. Do not look so anxious and solicitous, dear Elsie; one would suppose you imagined I was destined to fill a drunkard's grave, to see the anxious look you invariably assume when I take a little wine or brandy. Soon the season of gayety will be over, and then I will need nothing to stimulate me. Come, dear Elsie, finish arranging my hair, it is getting late."

Elsie resumed her task, and soon Emily Leslie stood before her mirror in her transcendent beauty, arrayed in full evening costume; a rich robe of blush-colored satin fell around her graceful figure in heavy folds, over which floated an overdress of white lace, looped up at the side with bunches of roses and green sprays. Upon her neck she wore a pearl necklace, and her wrists were encircled by bracelets of the same; her curls were twined with pearls, roses and green leaves.

"There, I guess I'll do," she said, as she surveyed herself in the mirror. "Really, those pearls look charming, don't they, coz?"

"They are, indeed, very beautiful, and become you exceedingly well," replied Elsie.

"How I wish you were to attend this ball, you would enjoy it, I am confident. It is so stupid in you to remain at home pouring over some dull book. I, for my part, cannot comprehend how you manage to endure it."

"To me, it seems as if there was something in life more serious and more rational, to afford pleasure than mere excitement and glittering show. I doubt not, if I were to mingle in scenes of gayety night after night, as you do, dear Emily, I would soon become fascinated with the excitement and pleasure of the ball-room, and similar entertainments, but I do not desire to cultivate a taste for these things while I have the opportunity to improve my mind with useful information that surrounds me."

"You are a strange girl, Elsie, and I cannot understand you, but I love you none the less, for these odd, old-fashioned notions of yours."

At this moment Mrs. Leslie appeared at the door, arrayed in velvet and sparkling with diamonds, and said:

"Come, dear, the carriage has been waiting for some time, and your father is growing impatient."

Throwing her opera cloak loosely over her shoulders, the beautiful girl left the room, throwing a kiss to her cousin as she closed the door after her.

"Gay, beautiful and happpy," murmured Elsie, as she gathered the articles together which lay scattered in direful confusion around the room. "Gay beautiful, and happy," she repeated—"but will it always be so? Ah, no, I fear not, for she is now nursing in her bosom a serpent that will sting her in after years if I am not mistaken. Alas, that one so beautiful should throw herself away in this manner."

The ball-room was brilliantly lighted, and gayly dressed forms were flirting through the mazes of the dance, when Mr. and Mrs. Leslie, accompanied by their beautiful daughter entered the room.

Murmurs of admiration were heard to fall from many lips, as the ball-room belle, leaning upon the arm of her father crossed the room in order to obtain a seat, and beaux, fops and admirers pressed around the beautiful Miss Leslie as soon as she was seated.

"Who is that young lady?" inquired a stately looking gentleman standing near the entrance, of his companion.

"That young lady is the daughter of Howard Leslie, one of our wealthy merchants—she is the acknowledged belle of the season. Is she not beautiful?" replied the person addressed.

"Beautiful! why, she is angelic. I never saw so lovely a woman in my life. Are you acquainted? if so, pray present me."

"I will, with pleasure; excuse me a moment, and I will speak to her."

Sidney Richmond left his friend, and crossed the room; approaching Emily, he said:

"Miss Leslie, good evening, I am delighted to see you present this evening; I hope you have fully recovered from the effects of the fatigue attendant upon the gayeties of last evening."

"Thank you, Mr. Richmond, oh, yes; I never tire, you know. We had a delightful time last evening, did we not?"

"We did, indeed; I have a friend, Mr. Gray, who is anxious to be presented. May I be allowed the honor?"

"Certainly," was the brief reply, and in another moment Emily Leslie and Walter Gray were acquainted.

A word or two in regard to Walter Gray.

He was a man of perhaps thirty, a promising lawyer from a neighboring city. His parents had left him an orphan while he was yet a schoolboy; and when he reached his maturity, he became the possessor of a princely fortune. He had mingled much in society, but had never met a woman he considered suitable for a wife, and thus he had reached what many at the present day consider the years of bachelorhood, and was still unmarried. Many fair and beautiful women had endeavored to throw around him a captivating spell, all to no purpose, but now, on the evening he met Emily Leslie, he was in love. Reader, do you believe in love at first sight? I do, because I have often seen it demonstrated in life.

Yes, Walter Gray, the man most ladies considered a confirmed bachelor, was in love and with a ball-room belle, —the last person in the world he supposed he would fall in love with—beings he had for years professed to despise; but he found it impossible to resist the fascinations of Emily Leslie, and she was far from being disinterested in her admirer. She danced, chatted and flirted with him the entire evening, much to the discomfiture of numberless brainless fops who had followed in her train since the opening of the season.

When the scene of the gayety was over, Mr. Leslie extended a pressing invitation to Mr. Gray to call often while he remained in the city; and Emily declared "that he was the most fascinating man she had ever met."

Week after week flew past, and night after night found Emily at some scene of gayety, ever attended by Mr. Gray.

Elsie's fears were not without foundation; the habit of taking stimulants was steadily growing upon Emily—and every evening ere she dressed for the ball-room, or the theatre, she felt "obliged" to take something to drive away the feeling of depression that pervaded her being; the tablespoon was oftentimes a wine glass full. Elsie remonstrated with her, but it produced no effect; she "must have it," she said, or she "could not keep up," and she did have it.

After prolonging his stay two months Walter Gray returned to his home, not, however, before he had obtained a promise from Emily to meet him at Saratoga, when the season should be over, and the warm months of summer came.

No words of love had passed between them, but in a thousand ways Walter Gray had told his love, and in a thousand ways Emily had given him to understand that it was appreciated and reciprocated.

Not many days elapsed after his departure before Mr. Leslie received a letter from him requesting the privilege of corresponding with his daughter Emily, which request was readily granted, for Mr. Leslie was pleased with the attentions shown his daughter by Mr. Gray, and frequent missives passed between the lovers.

At length the season of fashion and gayety were over, and a few weeks of rest and quiet was allowed to fashion votaries, before the season at the watering places commenced, three weeks were employed in purchasing and making up wardrobes to display during the summer months at the Springs, Newport, or Niagara.

The secret sin Emily had determined to relinquish as soon as balls and parties were over, she found too forcibly established—too deeply rooted to throw aside without an effort—and she was unwilling—disinclined to make the necessary effort, and thus day after day, week after week she took her usual amount of stimulant.

The arrangements of the summer tour were all completed the trunks packed, and everything in readiness. Elsie had consented to accompany the family to Saratoga—and they all stood in the hall, arranged in traveling costume, waiting for the carriage to arrive which was to convey them to the depot when Emily was suddenly seized with a fit of fainting. They bore her to her chamber, and dispatched a messenger for a physician. When he arrived he shook his head sadly, and said:

"I fear, sir, your daughter will have a severe illness, there is every indication of an attack of brain fever."

And he was correct; the next morning poor Emily was in a high state of delirium. Mr. Leslie sent a telegram to Walter Gray informing him of the cause of their non arrival at Saratoga, where he was waiting to receive them.

Immediately upon the receipt of the dispatch he made arrangements to leave the place where he had anticipated so much pleasure with her he loved, and the next morning took passage in the first train for the city, where he arrived the following day. He hastened to the house of Mr. Leslie, but Emily was too ill to see him; indeed, if he had been permitted to enter her presence, she would not have known him, for she recognized no one, and was continually raving in a high state of delirium. Elsie was untiring in her care and nursing of the invalid; she remained by her couch night and day. Mrs. Leslie also was a diligent nurse, and unceasing in her vigils, until, overcome with fatigue and excitement, she sank upon a couch sickness herself. Thus Elsie's cares were doubled.

Day after day went by, and Mrs. Leslie and Emily grew no better—indeed, Mrs. Leslie steadily declined, and the disease that chained her to her couch assumed a more malignant form, and ere two weeks had passed she breathed her last, unconscious until the very hour that death removed her from this earth. She went into the presence of her maker without preparation for the change from life to death—her life had been one careless round of gayety and fashionable dissipation.

After her form had been laid to rest in her earth couch, Emily began to recover, and, after consciousness returned, almost hourly inquired for her mother, but in her present weak state it was deemed unadvisable to inform her of the loss she had sustained.

After a few days she was able to sit up in her easy chair. Every day Walter Gray passed an hour in the society of the invalid.

One day, after he had left her, Elsie sat at her feet upon a low cushion, when Emily said:

"Is mamma, then, so very ill?"

"She has been, very," replied Elsie, evasively; and then, to change the subject of conversation, she added: "Have you noticed this beautiful bouquet Walter left for you?" taking a splendid bouquet afrom the dressing-table, and holding it towards Emily.

"Yes," replied Emily, "but I wish to know about my mother. You all seem to avoid talking about her, whenever I ask a question concerning her; there has something terrible happened, which you desire to conceal from me, I know; but I am strong enough to bear it. Come, Elsie, tell me all."

Feeling that further concealment was impossible, Elsie replied:

"Your mother watched beside your sick bed until, overcome by fatigue and anxiety, she was obliged to seek her couch. A long and dangerous illness followed until she—"

Elsie paused, she could not finish the sentence. Emily gazed into her face earnestly for a moment, then exclaimed:

"And is my mother dead? Oh, can it be?"

"Yes," faintly murmured Elsie, "she is dead; we buried her a week ago."

Emily's head sank upon her hands, and the hot tears fell through her open fingers, her frame quivering with emotion.

Emily had entirely recovered her strength, and in compliance with the expressed wish of Walter they were to be married. It was to be a quiet, private bridal, and they were to immediately sail for Europe. Elsie was to accompany them.

It was the day of the wedding. Emily sat in her easy chair, and Else was arranging her hair. On the dressing table stood a small, cut-glass bottle filled with brandy, and beside it a glass; every few moments Emily would pour from the bottle into the glass two or three swallows and drink it—void of adulteration.

"Oh, Emily, Emily, you know not what you are doing; only think, but a few months since, you could drink but a few drops of brandy in a glass half full of water, and now you drink half a glass full raw. You will go on in this, until you blight all your prospects of happiness, and bring sorrow and disappointment to the home your husband will provide for you. You know he is bitterly opposed to taking stimulents, and doubtless would feel very unpleasant if he knew you were under the influence of liquor when taking upon yourself the marriage vows."

"Oh, Elsie, dear, I do wish you would not forever be harping upon this one string, it is simply ridiculous; you know I have been so very weak since my illness that it is positively necessary for me to take something stimulating."

"It may be so, Emily, but if you had not accustomed yourself to taking such things when in perfect health, you would not have required one-half the amount you how take, really it is fearful; and speaking candidly, I firmly believe that if Walter knew of this terrible habit, this secet sin you have contracted, notwithstanding the ardent love he feels for you, he would refuse to take you for his wife."

"Oh, dear cousin, you treat such a trivial thing in to serious a manner; after I become Mrs. Gray, I will leave off this habit, which seems to cause you so much anxiety."

They were married—and immediately sailed for Europe—two years they spent in travel, then returned to their native land, leaving Elsie behind them, as the bride of a gallant French officer, a noble and worthy man; but two weeks after their return Mr. Leslie died. After his death Emily indulged more freely than ever in taking stimulents. Walter was sorely grieved when he discovered this secret sin his beloved had contracted, and endeavored by kind treatment and persuasive words to break her of so loathsome a habit—but it was of no avail: as day after day passed over her head she grew more and more firmly addicted to this sin; until society was given up, all visitors sent away—and Emily—once the beautiful and accomplished ball room belle, was a habitual drunkard, confined to her room, but her husband would not allow her to leave her chamber, lest the disgrace should become known; but such things cannot be kept quiet and soon Mrs. Gray's sin was the common topic of conversation in the circles in which she had moved.

At length Walter determined to place her in an asylum, and leave her. Oh, how changed, how bitterly changed were both! his beautiful hair was mixed with silver threads, his brow marked by deep care-lines, his once erect and gallant figure bent, and the smile that used to play around his lips had fled.

He found an asylum for Emily, and left her in charge of nurses and physicians—and again sailed for Europe to seek change of scene. He sought a home in the family of Elsie, and her husband; here he remained two years and returned to America, accompanied by Elsie, her husband and child. He immediately went to the asylum to inquire about his wife, having had no communication with the person in charge during his absence! but, alas, they could tell him nothing concerning her—she had escaped from them soon after his departure and gone, no one knew whither.

With a sad heart he returned to his home, and communicated the disagreeable intelligence to Elsie.

One afternoon, not long after their arrival, as he and Elsie were riding through Broadway, they passed a cart upon which lay the body of a woman covered with tattered garments, apparently lifeless—but in reality beastly intoxicated. One glance at the bloated features convinced them that it was Emily. The carriage was stopped, and the woman removed from the cart to the luxuriant coach, and they were hastily driven homeward.

No pen can describe the feelings of those two persons as they rode over the rough pavements with her who had once been so dear to them, beside them in such a state. Walter bowed his head upon his hands and wept.

Elsie tried to weep, but the tears refused to flow, and her head and heart seemed bursting with agony and pain. For two days Emily remained in a state of lethargy, and then breathed her last.

Alas! what a fearful account had she to settle with her Maker. Walter, broken-hearted, soon sank to rest in the arms of death.

Elsie still lives, and whenever she sees an intoxicated person a faintness steals over her, for she cannot forget her once beautiful cousin as she looked the last two days of her life.

This may appear to some of my readers an overdrawn picture, but, believe me, there are hundreds of cases in our large cities similar to the one given in this sketch, and several even worse than the above have been known to the author.

The Bad Boy.

"We had company at dinner to-day," said the bad boy, "and pa is always in his element when we have company. He prides himself on his carving. We had a roast of beef, and before it went on the table I took the steel that pa sharpens the carving-knife on, and made two holes right through the roast, and then I took a rawhide whip that pa basted me with once, cut it in two, and run pieces of the rawhide in the holes of the beef. Pa began carving with a smile, and asked the minister if he would have his beef rare, or an outside piece. He was bearing gently on the carving-knife, when the knife struck the rawhide and it wouldn't go any farther. Pa smiled, and said he guessed he had struck a barbed-wire fence, and he turned the roast around and cut again, and he struck the rawhide. The minister drummed with his fork and spoke to ma, and said, 'We had a splendid meeting Wednesday night," and ma said it was perfectly gorgeous, and pa began to perspire and turn red in the face, and he said some words that would sound better in a brewery, and be tried to gouge off some meat, but it wouldn't come, and the minister said: "Brother, you seem to be having a monkey and a parrot time with that roast,' and that made pa mad, and he said he would carve his own meat without any sky pilot's interference, and ma said: 'Why, pa, you should not be so impudent,' and pa said he could whip the butcher that sold him that piece of work-ox, and he sent the beef out to the kitchen and the company ate cold liver. The girl got the meat in the ice-chest, and pretty soon I went down cellar, 'cause I didn't like cold liver, and pulled out the rawhide, and I had all the fatted calf I wanted, and I gave the rest to that lame dog you see me have here a spell ago. Oh, a boy can get enough to eat if he has got any originality about him."—Peck's Sun.

CONEY ISLAND.

Disappearing in the Ocean.

From the Chicago Times.

New York Special—Coney Island is being rapidly eaten up by the encroaching ocean, Everybody who has visited the beach this summer is astonished at the changes wrought by last winter's storms. This sandy reach, which is worth many thousands every year to the Coney Island railroads and hotelkeepers, is being swept out to sea, and apparently nothing can save it. The waves dash nearer and nearer every year to the big hotels. At Brighton beach there has been for several years an immense combination bath house, restaurant, promenade, and beer hall, covering nearly two acres of ground. On a shady portico seventy-five feet wide, in front of this big building, one could drink beer at tables and look out on a stretch of white sand and the bathers disporting themselves in the surf beyond. Well, the terrible storms of last winter ate up this stretch of sand and advanced the permanent domain of the ocean right up to the building, so that the waves dashed a little against it. It was necessary, at an expense of thousands of dollars, to take the building down and then set it up again 175 feet back of its original site, Manhattan Beach has suffered so much in the storms of the past three years that it now has no beach at all, and it has lost its bathing facilities, in order to save its buildings it was necessry to place a wall of piles between them and the ocean, and now the guests of Manhattan have the unsatisfactory privilege of strolling along a plank walk and looking out on the unattainable ocean at an altitude of fifteen feet above the water. The marine railroad between Brighton and Manhattan beaches was entirely washed away last winter and for the third time it has been rebuilt, and each time it has been removed twenty-five feet up the beach. So the disintegrating process is growing on and it has its effect upon the popularity of the island as a pleasure resort. A fine hard beach is the sine qua non of all ocean watering places, But at Coney Island everybody sees the beach rapidly melting away, and its place usurped by long lines of ugly piling. The piling will save the improvements, but it destroys the chief attraction of the island. People will still visit the island for a whiff of ocean air, but one-half of its pleasureable resources are taken away in the destruction of the beach.

Triumph of Surgery.

Modern surgery is able to provide a man with a new nose, new lips, new eyelids, and an artificial throat. It can do more; it can, by the process known as skin-grafting, provide him with a new skin. The following description of the process is reported by an English surgeon:

"The patient, a pretty little girl of eight, was admitted into St. George's hospital. Two years previously, her dress had caught fire, burning both legs from the hips to the knees severely.

"After a year's treatment the left thigh had healed up; but the right had never got better, and presented a terrible ulcer, extending all down the outer side.

"For four months she lay there without any signs of improvement. On the fifth of May, the child was brought into the operating theatre, and placed under the influence of chloroform.

"Two small pieces of skin were then snipped from the back with a pair of sharp-pointed scissors, and imbedded—planted, in fact—in the granulations or 'proud-flesh' of the wound—two tiny atoms, scarcely bigger than a pin's head, and consisting of little more than the cuticle or outer skin which we raise in blisters by rowing or exposure to hot sun.

"Five days later, no change was visible; and-by-and-by the operation was considered to have failed, since the pieces of skin had disappeared, instead of growing as had been expected.

"But twelve days after the operation, two little white cicatrices appeared where the seed had been sown; and in my notes I find that a week later these were big enough to be dignified as "islands of new tissue."

"The most wonderful part of it was that, not only did those islands grow and increase rapidly in circumference, but the fact of their presence seemed to stimulate the ulcer itself, which forthwith took on a healing action around its margin.

"Several more grafts were implanted subsequently, including morsels from Mr. Pollock's arm, from my own, and from the shoulder of a negro; the last producing a white scar-tissue like the rest. In two months the wound was healed, and the little patient was discharged cured."

No science has made more rapid progress during the last century than surgery. The skillful surgeon is becoming one of the best friends of mankind.—Youth's Companion.

How to Succeed.

If you want to succeed in life, you must wrap yourself in mystery. If you earn but five dollars a week, you must dissemble in such a manner as to make people believe you enjoy a princely income.

You must talk about wealthy people as though intimately acquainted with them. You must walk down town to save money, and tell people you do it for the exercise, which you need because of your sedentary position, even if you are a hod-carrier in an obscure neighborhood.

If you can't get an overcoat, smilingly go without one, and laugh at the man who wears one, and say you are not delicate and the weather is not half cold enough, and you're afraid you will be obliged to put on your summer underclothing if it doesn't hurry up and get cold.

If you can't afford to leave the city during the heated term, say you prefer the city, every time, and ridicule the country as much as possible by saying it is only a bower of mosquitoes and malaria, and that you can't get a decent meal there to save your lif

When an elderly man asks you how much money you are making out of idle curiosity, turn about and smilingly ask him if he thinks Tilden will run. Never answer his question, and, above all things, never swap confidences or become intimate with people you meet in a boarding-house. When a man tells you how you might make a big fortune, ask him how it is that he is poor. And when he tells you how rich he would be if he were only your age, tell him that no one can preach success as eloquently as a pronounced failure.

If you incline to gambling, leave stocks alone and go and risk your money in a legitimate gambling-house. It is all gambling, and the same thing; but the regularly ordained gambling-house gives you your verdict right before your eyes, on the spot.

Never rush in to seperate two men who are fighting on the street. If you do you may be struck by both parties. Stand off and take in the circus. If men have sufficient provocation to maul each other, it would be cowardly and wicked for them not to fight.

Never land at a friend's house at meal-time. It will look as though you are trying to secure a gratuitous dinner; and, besides, you will not get a better dinner than you can buy anywhere for a dollar; and they may have a number of things on the table you don't like, and you will have to eat out of courtesy.

Never spend ten thousand dollars to have your daughter taught to sing, or play on the piano, because you can go and get surfeited with the best professional living for two dollars. Besides as your daughter is becoming proficient, she will marry a dry-goods drummer and leave you. After a woman marries she closes the piano for good, and stops singing, in order to find time to talk.

Never buy a dog from a boy you don't know.

Never have your picture taken with a coronet in your mouth, an accordeon in your hand, or a fire-hat on your head.

Never wear cuff-buttons or scarf-pins designed to show your calling.—Puck.

Roman Relics.

As we drove through the principal street, containing the residences of Rome's first citizens, I read several names on the door plates, and was delighted to know that the families of Brutus, Caius Fabricius, and Appius Claudius were still in existence, though the founders had been dead several years, at least so Lucius Junius informed me.

"And whose residence is that?" I asked, drawing attention to a stately mansion which was unoccupied, and having a large card displayed in the window, with "To let. 700 lires per month."

"That, signor, is the home of the younger Casca; but he is an envious, miserly man, and can never get a tenant, he makes the rent so large."

"Is he the son of the Casca who made the rent in Cæsar's garment?"

"He is, signor; and the trait runs in the family."

"Thank you," replied I, handing Lucius a lire for being so truthful.

Our guide next conducted us to the Roman museum, where we viewed the numerous curiosities so well known in history, but only observable to a few. Lucius Junius pointed out a large glass case containing a flock of seven stuffed geese, headed by a solemn-looking gander.

"And, pray what does all this mean, Lucius?" asked I of the guide.

"These, signor, are what saved the city."

"And what is that garment hanging on yonder peg?"

"The togo of the illustrious Cæsar," he replied.

"What are those augur-bits on the shelf there?"

"Those, signor, are the four augurs that interpreted omens."

"What are those wax figures arrayed in white?" said I, pointing to a row of six or eight lay figures arranged against the wall.

"The vestal virgins, signor."

"You haven't got any sabine women in your collection, have you, Lucius?"

"No, signor, they were all carried away several months ago."

"What are those two wax babies?"

A Brute's Affection.

One of the most touching of anecdotes about dogs, is told of a collie shepherd dog, owned by a Mr. H——, which was very clever at its duty, until it had a litter of puppies to tend. Only one puppy was spared to it, and on this the poor collie so centered its affections as to do most unwillingly the work she had to do.

The master, vexed at the collie's unwillingness, cruelly drowned the puppy before the mother's eyes, covering the bucket in which he left the body with a sack. He then went round the fields followed by the dog, who from that moment resumed her usefulness.

On Mr. H——'s return, after having had his tea in the evening, he bethought himself of the bucket, and went to fetch it to empty the contents into a hole he had made in the manure heap.

He found the bucket, covered as he had left it, but on pouring out the contents there was nothing but water. He questioned his wife and her niece, but neither knew anything about it.

The next morning Mrs. H——. was struck with the piteous expression of the poor animal's face, and she said to her, "Scottie, tell me where you have taken your puppy?"

The dog immediately ran off a distance of quite a hundred yards to the kitchen garden, jumped the fence and went direct to the farther end of the garden, to a spot situated between two rows of beans; there, where the earth had been apparently recently moved, she sat and, as it were, wept.

Mrs. H——went again into the house, and without mentioning what had occurred, said to her niece. "Ask Scottie what she has done with her puppy."

The question was put, and again the poor creature went through the same performance.

These circumstances were mentioned to Mr. H——, who pooh-poohed the idea of their being anything out of the common; but to satisfy his wife, went to the spot, and dug down a distance of three feet, and there sure enough had the faithful, fond mother carried and buried her little one.

A true tale comes from Michigan of a Nimrod who saw a muskrat near the edge of the water twenty feet away. If he shot the animal it would fall into the water. But be shot, and at the same time jumped forward so very simultaneously that he got there before the shot, which he received in his back.

FARMERS' COLUMN.

Items of Interest to Farmers.

The early Ohio potato proves to be a week or ten days earlier than the Early Rose, to which it bears a striking resemblance in habit and manner of growth. The vines are of vigorous growth, the tubers being almost round in shape and of a uniform size. They cook dry and mealy; but although of the finest quality are not exactly of pure white color.

No farmer, says W. A. Armstrong can expect to realize full profits from manure of any kind until he has put his soil into the proper condition for sustaining plant growth.

A. M. Miller, of Illinois, is traveling through England with his own horses and carriage, so as to see the country and people at his leisure. The Press, of Philadelphia, suggests that it would be well for some of our thrifty farmers to follow his example at home and thus study the agriculture of our country.

If we would abolish the horse trots at agricultural fairs, let all keep away from them and study the agricultural exhibits.

Again an "off" year for apples. Michigan will not have enough for home consumption. Kansas is one of the most lucky States.

Most every one living in the country has observed openings, the size of a hen quill, on the surface of the ground, with little rough fragments of earth scattered about them. How many know that these are the burrows of worms? How many would imagine that every acre of good cultivated land contains 29,000,000 worms? Finally who can help being surprised on learning that the rough fragments of earth mentioned as lying at the openings of the burrows are a kind of manure, voided by the worms, and that the amount of this manure deposited on each acre, where it has been measured, exceeds ten tons for one year? Worm manure cannot be called rich. A great portion of worm food is the soil itself, but in addition to this leaves and any othe accessible vegetable substance are eaten by these animals in large quantity. But the great service of worms to agriculture lies in the pulverizing and admixing operation performed upon the soil while passing through their bodies, an operation to which is almost wholly due, as now seems, that richlayer of fine uniform black earth near the surface, called vegetable mold.

Hints for the Housewife.

Mousseline Pudding.—Take four ounces of sugar, four of butter, the rind of one lemon and the juice of two, with the yolks of ten eggs to be mixed in a sauce-pan and stirred on a slow fire. Strain the mixture and pour among it the whites of the eggs, after whisking them to a froth. Place in a mold and steam for half an hour. Serve with jam or sauce.

Satchets are now made by inclosing the perfume in a muslin bag and putting it in one of velvet in any of the new shades. The bag is made very flat, the ends being merely gathered and tied with a narrow ribbon or velvet.

Potatoes make very nice muffins, boiled and mashed with a small piece of butter and two eggs beaten into them and a little warm water added together with a small bit of yeast cake dissolved, and a little warm milk and flour till all of the proper consistency. Set in a warm place to rise, and bake in rings.

A very pretty tidy is made by sewing strips of Valenciennes insertion together until you have the desired size for a tidy; line this with ribbon of different colors, and it may be of different widths, finish with a lace edge. The ribbons need not be entirely fresh, but must be ironed smooth. Another way to make a handsome tidy at small expense is to get an oblong or square of satin, cover half of it diagonally with lace insertion sewed together, trim with a pretty edge, and on the corner of the satin which is not covered by lace work a spray of flowers.

A simple and inexpensive method of clearing the waste-pipe of washstands, bath-tub, or kitchen, the stoppage of which often entails great expense, is said to be as follows: Just before retiring at night pour into the pipe enough liquid potash lye of thirty-six degrees strength to fill the "trap," as it is called, or bent portion of the pipe just below the outlet. About a pint will suffice for a washstand, or a quart for a bath-tub or kitchen sink. Be sure that no water runs into it till next morning. During the night the lye will convert all of the offal in the pipe into soft soap, and the first current of water in the morning will remove it entirely and leave the pipe as clean as new. The so-called potash lye is not recommended for this purpose. The lye should be kept in heavy glass bottles or demijohns, covered with wicker work, and plainly labeled; always under lock when not in actual use.

Fried Canned Tomatoes.—Procure fine ripe, smooth specimens; cut in two; put into the frying pan very sweet lard, when very hot, drop in the tomatoes skin side down; when nearly done pack in cans, add a little hot water to the juice in the pan, fill the can as full as possible with it, and seal hermitically. If there is the least air-hole, nothing spoils more quickly. When wanted for use, pour off the water and grease, lay on a plate, season and cook until brown in a small quantity of melted butter. Add cream for gravy. By this method they can be had all winter, and are just as good as when fresh.

Peppermint in Mississippi.

The announcement is made by a correspondent in the Country Gentleman that the cultivation of peppermint has has been wonderfully successful in east Mississippi. It has long been supposed that this hardy northern plant would not thrive in the south; but from some very extensive experiments made, it is now believed that the oil can be produced at the south at a less price than has ever been done before, and still give a fair profit to the producer. If these new Mississippi plantations turn out anything like what is claimed they will do, our northern peppermint plantations will soon be abandoned, for there is only a limited demand for the oil, and the least over-production causes a decline in price below a profitable figure.

A Motto for Farmers.

"Dollars for comforts, but not a cent for luxuries!" is a good home motto for every farmer. The largest, sunniest apartment in every farm house should be in daily use by the family, and the most cheerless room should be used for the parlor, which is rarely opened except at funerals and for the meetings of the sewing society. The freshest eggs and the sweetest butter and the earliest fruit should not all be sent to market and a good share of the proceeds invested in bananas, almonds, raisins, coffee and tea. It is bad policy to cut down the shade trees along the wayside to raise money for the purchase of fashionable parasols for the women folks. It is time misspent for those who "having eyes see not," to stroll through the grounds of an agricultural fair, with their hands in their pockets and a perverse expression of discontent on their countenances, as they witness on every hand the evidence of a progressive success which they affect to disdain. Soldiers are given the brightest, sharpest, and most effective weapons—so every farmer should have the very best machines and implements for the war which he has to wage against vegetable aggressors and insect depredators in the field, the orchard and the garden, and every framer's wife should have every appliance for economizing muscle. All that remains for a farmer to do, is to subscribe to a first-class agricultural paper, and to say, as did Shakespeare's workingman: "I owe no man hate, and envy no man's happiness; am glad with every man's good, and content with my own farm."

Hops in the Far Northwest.

Wo of the hop-growing districts of Puget sound, says a local paper, do not share in the depression of crops that so weighs down the farmers of Oregon, notwithstanding the reports to the contrary in regard to the state of hops being only one-half or one-third of an average yield. The actual fact of the case are that the yield will compare faverably with that of last year, and most of the crops are in good condition. One or two fields have been affected with a black mildew, but it is not prevalent, and very few of the newer ones have suffered from the drought. But nine-tenths of the yards are in fine condition. The leaves are large and glossy; the hops, of a delicate yellowish green, are rapidly developing, and in three weeks will be ripe. One thing that has been in favor of the growers in the Puyallup and Stuck valleys is the smoky state of the atmosphere, and also the heavy dews. The smoke has kept off the direct rays of the sun, and probably saved the yards from failure. Little is known as to the prospective prices of hops this year. The bonanza of last season will hardly be realized, however. Indians from various parts of the valley are already coming to spy out the lane, and find out how much "potlach" the various growers will pay in the way of potatoes, beef, pasturage, and "tillicum' money, besides what they earn. The growers are somewhat at the mercy of the pickers, who are well aware of it, and often compel them to come to more liberal terms by threatening to leave them in the busiest part of the season. Probably Chinamen will be employed to some extent.

New Pastimes for Ladies,

A Gotham scribe to the Syracuse Journal writes: "Frogs have long been considered a delicacy with gourmands, but it is new for ladies to think it a sport and romance to catch them, or better, perhaps, to spear them. The poverty of amusements in several villages near the city, made a resort during the summer, suggested to some enterprising woman the idea of going out in the evening with jack lanterns to the ponds "frogging" with spears, or pitchforks tied with ribbons. It is said that at first the ladies could not keep from screaming when they saw the big frogs on the logs, or in the bullrushes and would throw down their implements of torture, and run some distance, but after a second sober thought go back to face the enemy under the instruction of a native frog-hunter. The popular style of "frogging," however, has been to go in a boat with jacklights in the bow. The frogs, attracted by the lights, come from their hiding places, give a croak, and all is over, as a ribboned spear dispatches them. Sometimes the ladies fish for frogs, using a hook baited with red flannel, and say that a well-mannered frog can not resist the temptation of snapping at this much-esteemed color. It is predicted that another season 'frogging' will be immensely popular at the inland watering places. The mania for water turtles with the fair sex is another novel caprice. The smaller the turtles, the more they are prized, and are deemed sufficiently pretty to be carried about in ornamental silk bags on the arms of their owners. A young girl returning from Richfield springs had a dozen or more diminuitive turtles in a box which she played with, pulling their tails and legs, and throwing them about as she emptied them on the table, where they scampered industriously to her infinite amusement and pleasure."

The First Velocipede.

A French journal republishes the following account of the first velocipede which appeared at Dijon on August 25, 1818: "This morning at 10 o'clock a machine has been tried in the Place Royal, which is called "draistenne" or velocipede. It has proved a success, M. Lagrange, turner of Beaune, came yesterday from that town, which is seven miles (French measurement) distant from Dijon, in two and half hours. He went rapidly round the market-place, and seems to be well practised in the use of the machine. Two draisiennes have been seen in action at the same time. M. Lagrange has already constructed several of great solidity and of very elegant appearance. Those who would like to procure for themselves this new means of transport can do so by applying to M. Lagrange. It is said that to-morrow, during the festivities in the park on the occasion of the fete of St. Louis, M. Lagrange will give another proof of the celerity of the economica steed, which consumes neither hay nor oats."

Building Nets on Wires.

Some very curious observations have been made on the German telegraph wires at the instance of the secretary of the postoffice, and in a paper read before the Electrotechnic Society of Berlin some interesting facts were given proving that in districts where there are no trees the smaller birds of prey, such as sparrows, starlings and swallows, frequently alight on the telegraph wires in great numbers. Swallows like to build under eaves were the wires run into the offices, and sometimes cause an "earth" contact. Contacts between wire and wire are frequently caused by large birds, such as bustards, storks, swans and wild ducks They cause the wire to bend and sometimes to break. Accidents of this kind were frequent when the wires ran by high roads along which young geese were driving to their pastures. Smaller birds, even partridges, are generally killed by the shock of striking the wires. They do not cause much damage to the lines. Holes are often pecked through the poles by woodpeckers, the picas martin or black woodpecker, picas viridis or green woodpecker, and the dica, major or piebald woodpecker none of which spare any kind of wood wtih which they come in contact.

"YOU BID ME TRY."

You bid me try, Blue Eyes, to write
A rondeau. What!—forthwith—to-night.
Reflect. Some skill I have, 'tis true;
But thirteen lines—and rhymed on two—
"Refrain," as well. Ah, helpless plight!

Still there are five lines—ranged aright.
These Gallic bonds, I feared would fright
My easy Muse. They did tell you—
You bid me try!
That makes them nine. The port's in sight;—
'Tis all because your eyes are bright!
Now just a pair to end with 'oo,'—
When maids command, what can't we do!
Behold!—the rondeau, tasteful, light,
You bid me try!

—Modern Age.

A LITTLE RUSSIAN SERVANT.

"Who's that?" asked the countess, stopping in front of a young girl fifteen or sixteen years of age, bent over an embroidery frame. The young girl rose, prostrated herself thrice before her mistress, then getting up, remained standing, her hands hanging by her side, her head slightly bent forward under the investigating gaze of the countess, who, through her eye-glass, closely scrutinized her.

"It is the new girl, your highness," answered the head lady's maid, coming forward with the air of importance that thirty years employment gives to no matter what functionary. "She is the daughter of Foma, of the village of Ikenine. She is come in her turn to pay her father's obrok—he is in Moscow."

"These peasant girls can do nothing," said the countess, with a wearied air; "what do you expect to get out of this one?"

"She doesn't embroider badly, your highness; pray look yourself. She can be put to the embroideries—not to the ground, but to the trimmings. This is for the toilet table of Madame la Comtesse."

The noble lady, who could hardly see, being short-sighted from her birth, examined the embroidery frame so closely that the tip of her nose grazed the cloth.

"That's not bad, she said. "Come here, little girl."

The little girl advanced, and the countess inspected her as minutely as she had done the embroidery.

"How pretty she is! What's your name?"

"Mavra."

The word came like a breath from the rosy lips.

"You must speak louder if you want us to hear you," said the head lady's maid, angrily.

Mavra turned her large, blue, startled eyes toward her, let them drop, and said nothing.

"Sit down to your work," said the countess, amused at her new toy. With a quick, graceful movement the young girl resumed her seat on the wooden chair, and, the needle firmly held between her agile fingers, went in and out of the stuff with that short, sharp noise that stimulates the action of the band.

"That's right; you may go on," said the countess, her nerves irritated by the regularity of the movement.

Then, turning her back upon the young girl and trailing the heavy, sumptuous folds of her dressing gown along the carefully-washed pine wood floor, she disappeared through the door, which was respectfully closed after her by the head lady's maid. The countess, an accomplished mistress of a house, made a practice of paying a daily visit to this room, which was reserved for the women of her service. Mavra was left alone in the workshop, a large, well-lighted chamber, furnished simply with tables and chairs for the use of the innumerable women and girls invariably attached to the service of these noble ladies who know so well how to maintain their rank in that blessed time of serfdom. At this hour the workroom was empty. Some of the women were washing, others ironing, some cleaning and turning upside down everything in the private apartment the countess had just left. The young peasant girl, with her needle uplifted, rested her ruddy hand upon the edge of the frame and looked around her.

What multitudes of embroidered gowns, with their rich lace trimmings, hung there on the wall, waiting some slight repairs. What endless petticoats, with their ornamented flounces, all freshly ironed, on cords along the huge room. What countless lace caps, worn hardly an hour, pinned to a pincushion as large as a pillow, used only for this purpose; and there, in a basket on the corner of the table, what piles of cambric chemises, delicately piped and plaited, trimmed with Valenciennes lace and ornamented with bright ribbons. And all this for one person, without counting the silk stockings in that other basket, and the rings by dozens worn by the countess on her thin fingers. In this world of living beings under God's heaven, what importance given to one person, that needed so many other persons to serve her, and how the nothingness of these was made more emphatic by the dominance of that. Mavra sat wonder-stricken. The head lady's maid coming into the room found her still in a state of stupefaction, stupefied above all at having made these reflections.

"Well, you are lucky," she said to her, with a boastful look. "Our countess took a fancy to you at the first glance; you are now on the list of embroiderers. You may thank God for it. It is not often the countess takes a fancy like that at first sight."

"Is she, then, unkind?" innocently inquired the girl.

Unkind! Oh, no; capricious, like all mistresses, but the kindest lady in the world, and generous. Besides, this is a rich house; nothing is counted—nothing at all. This is better than your village," continued Dacka, proud of belonging to such noble masters, and desirous of impressing on the mind of the simple peasant girl the importance and dignity of the functions she was promoted to.

"It is more beautiful," replied Mavra, bending intently over her work.

"It was lucky they taught you to embroider, else you would have been sent to the poultry yard to feed the cocks and hens and look after the calves. How did you learn?"

"My mother taught me; she was formerly in service; she was a dvorovala in the time of the late countess. She married a peasant."

"Ah!" said Dacka, "I thought your manners were not quite those of a peasant girl; if your mother was in service, that's another thing. Come, take a cup of coffee with me. Prepare the coffee pot and make haste before the others come; I can't ask everyone, you understand."

To Mavra there was but little difference between the isba of her father and the workroom of the seignorial mansion. Here, as there, her life was spent in assiduous work from sunrise to sunset. There, her mother, an austere, somber woman, like most village matrons, to whom life had proved no light matter; here, the lady's maid, often grumbling, but at times kind and even condescending. The chief difference between the two modes of life consisted of the daily visits of the countess, who generally said nothing, but passed with a solemn air through this roomful of silent, awestricken women. But one thing was lacking to Mavra, and this nothing could replace—the evening hour of rest which she used to spend by the fountain when sent to draw water for her mother, on the threshold of their cabin watching the spring rain falling soft and warm, melting the snow so quickly that its thickness might be seen visibly diminishing; or, again, in the month of May, standing at the edge of the forest, listening to the nightingales singing on the delicate, golden branches of the perfumed birch tree.

Winter passed fairly well, but when the first breath of warm air set the melting snow streaming down the roofs, which again the night's frost transformed into long stalactites of ice, Mavra felt a strange, vague aching in her heart. The house was overheated, and [illegible] her as some august being nearer her creator than any other of her fellow creatures. Not only did Mavra pray to God for her, but at times she inwardly prayed to her as a saint, thinking the pleadings of a being so superior must have equal weight with the powers of heaven as with those of earth.

Summer was already on the wane when the noble mansion, habitually so tranquil, was suddenly filled with noise and gayety. The young Count Serge had sent his carriages on before him; saddle horses and hounds were stamping and neighing in their stalls and barking in their kennels as though the one aim of life were to make the most noise possible in a given time.

"How handsome he is, our young count," Dacka kept on saying the livelong day to while away the tedious hours in the silent workroom. "It was I received him in my arms when he was born."

And she repeated again and again, with inexhaustive complacency, the history of Serge's birth, and the legend of his boyhood up to the moment when this dear treasure of her heart had gone to join the corps of pages, his trunks laden with cakes, jams and all that could possibly be eaten under heaven.

The workgirls have listless heed to these hundred-times-repeated narrations, but Mavra was never tired hearing them; it was like receiving a sort of gospel into her heart. Her good and revered protectress made all things dear and venerated that touched her nearly, and this only son, loved, adored, longed for, became a supernatural being, a kind of Messiah, to her.

One morning at the end of August as Mavra, who had risen early, was crossing the courtyard to go waken up the laundress, who had overslept herself, she saw, galloping along the inclosure, a troika of black horses with their heads covered with bells. "It's the young master," thought the little servant, and without giving herself time for reflection she ran to the ponderous gate and threw it wide open. At the same moment the brilliant equipage arrived; the coachman pulled together his noble beasts, and, without slackening their gallop, they shot like an arrow past Mavra, and ten steps further on stood stock still at the foot of the steps. Dazed, her heart thrilled by she knew not what impressions of fear and joy, she received full in the face the gaze of two large black amazed and amused eyes.

"How like his mother!" thought Mavra, as she closed the huge gate that shut with a heavy bang.

She turned slowly toward the steps as Serge, jumped down from the carriage, looked round at her again. He smiled when he met her blue eyes full of simple admiration, and giving her a friendly nod, entered the house of his fathers. A minute after he was by the countess' bedside, pressed lovingly in her arms.

When they had chatted two whole hours, as they finished their tea, Serge, recollecting himself, suddenly said to his mother.

"What is this new acquisition you have made, mother? A little fair-haired Raphael opened the gate for me this morning."

The countess thought for a moment.

"Ah! I know," said she; "it's Mavra—a virtue—my dear child. A strange little creature who adores me."

"She is quite right," replied the son, respectfully. "What do you do with her?"

"She embroiders in the afternoon, and in the morning she attends on me; but, Serge, you must be prudent. My house is strictly kept; don't you go and amuse yourself making gallant speeches to my girls."

"Oh, mother! what do you take me for?" carelessly replied the young man. "I think of a woman only when she is in a casket suited to her style of beauty. Now here you may have pearls, but the casket is totally wanting."

They burst out laughing together. Only those who thoroughly understood these two beings could have guessed beneath this light talk the strict propriety of the mother and the son's respect for the maternal home. But Russians of the grand monde are so constituted that when they have no vice they take all imaginable trouble to affect it.

On leaving the dining room the countess and her son directed their steps toward the garden. In front of the house, in the courtyard, they met Mavra stooping under the weight of an enormous pile of linen, which she was carrying from the laundry. The sheets, held in under her crossed hands, reached so high that she had to raise her chin and turn her head sideways in order to see before her.

"See, there she is," said the countess in French, stopping to look at her.

"It is hard to say whether she is a Raphael or a Greuze," said Serge. "This morning she had more the look of a Raphael with a Russian nose; it is a hybrid style of beauty, but it has a certain charm."

They continued their walk, while Mavra entered the workroom with her pile of linen. When her hands were free she stood trembling and silent, as though she had been guilty of a crime.

"Well, what are you waiting for, said one of the girls, pulling her by the apron.

"I don't know," replied Mavra. "I feel as if I had received a blow, and my hands keep on trembling."

"You carried too heavy a load for your strength. Sit down, and you will see it will pass off."

And in fact it did pass away in a few minutes; but from that moment Mavra was haunted by a pair of black eyes that little suspected it.

Her veneration for the countess was in nowise diminished by this. On the contrary, she loved her more, if possible. But in place of one idol she had two. By little innocent tactics, that surprised herself, she succeeded in having the service of the young count's room assigned to her, and thenceforth her happiness was complete. The care of the wardrobe was in the hands of the valet-de-chambre, who scrupulously avoided doing anything else; and while Serge, on his magnificent black horse, was galloping along under the vaulted arches of the pine forests that interwove their long branches above his head, Mavra, penetrated by a sweet emotion, with profound gratitude to God for making her life so easy and happy, was smoothing with her delicate hands the fine linen sheets of the camp bed on which her dear young master slept, and passing her hesitating fingers over the pillow. "He will place his head there when night comes, and close his eyes in sleep." This thought made the young girl raise her hand and blush as though there had been a profanation.

Serge was the most breakneck rider in the world; not from bravado, since for the most part he was alone when he performed his wild exploits, but from instinctive contempt for danger. One fine morning, clearing a hedge six feet high—there were none lower—the count's horse stumbled and fell on its side. A touch of the spur made it spring up, but when Serge tried to spur the other side, that on which it had fallen, he suffered excruciating pain. Fortunately it was the last hedge, else he would have had some difficulty in getting home. He pushed on, however, and reached the entrance; but when he endeavored to rest his foot on the stirrup to alight, he found it absolutely impossible, and amid the lamentations of the servants who had gathered around, he had to let himself be taken down from his horse and be dragged, as he said, like a bundle to his bed.

When he was duly unbooted and examined the supreme indifference with which he allowed himself to be handled and moved about, spite of the paleness of his face, did not lessen the fact that he had seriously fractured his tibia.

The bone-setter was sent for, in conformity with a precept of the countess, who preferred a bone-setter at hand to the best surgeon in the world 300 miles off. A horridly complicated dressing, bristling with splints and bandages, was applied to the leg with very respectful but formal injunctions not to move, and to remain in bed for six weeks. [illegible]

When Serge got well she was the prey of an implacable, unconscious, immortal love. Henceforth she belonged to her idol. Present or absent, he was her adored master; for him alone she breathed. She would have almost hated the convalescence that day by day was taking him from her had not the young man's weakness obliged him frequently to seek her aid. Supporting himself with a stick in one hand and resting the other on Mavra's shoulder he would walk around his room. She was happy and proud the day when, to give the countess a surprise, she led him thus into the little salon where the countess, thinking he was asleep, was reading a devotional book. The agitated joy of the mother and the nervous gayety of the son brought the tears to the eyes of the young peasant girl; but stoical, like all the race, she drove her tears back to her heart.

Serge walked alone with a stick, then without a stick, limping a little. By-and-by his firm, elastic tread was heard again on the waxed oak floor. The Northern early winter was come, snow already blocking up from time to time the seignorial mansion, then melting under the breath of a warmer wind, till the great winter blockade finally set in. One day a sledge lined with fur, drawn by spirited horses, clinking the bells that studded the harness, drew up before the door. Serge and his mother stepped into it, waving a friendly farewell to the household that crowded around with noisy benedictions. The countess was to pass the winter at St. Petersburg, where her son was to resume his service in the hussars of Grodno. When they were gone, when the heavy gate which Mavra had opened one beautiful August day was shut, and the snow fell slowly in large flakes, reflecting the colors of the prism, it shut out all the outer world from the inmates of the seignorial mansion.

Mavra returned to her embroidery frame, no longer under the orders of the good Dacka, but under the capricious, fitful superintendence of a housekeeper charged in the interval with the workroom department. Life was not so easy, but what mattered it to Mavra that there should be more harshness or less kindness. She did not live in the present. Her waking hours were passed in an innocent ecstasy that wore her away without suffering. She did not know this was love. Had she known it no amount of prayers or tears would have been enough to expiate her unpardonable sin. She loved just as flowers blossom; her ideal was exalted, her dream pure, and she lived upon them. One less chaste would have died. And as regards the young count he had no idea of all this.

The countess came back in spring, and the house resumed its grand, hospitable ways. Mavra was profoundly touched to find that her mistress, far from having forgotten, inquired kindly after her. She returned to her personal attendance upon the countess with more devoted fervor than ever. Later on the young master was to come back. Dacka conveyed in a mysterious manner that he had something better to do than to bury himself in the country. In the evening she confided to the laundress, in interminable whispers, secrets that were no doubt interesting, but which Mavra made no attempt to overhear, being by nature and taste discreet and reserved.

On the eve of St. John, when young girls plait crowns of flowers, which they throw into the river to see if they are to be married within the year, Mavra went, like the others, to consult after this graceful fashion. She never dreamed of marriage; it was a closed world to her, into which she had no desire to penetrate; but she would plait a crown and watch it through the eddies of the capricious stream. The girls had thrown in their garlands. Mavra's got entangled in flowers that a young lad of twenty had just flung in. He was a carpenter. The two crowns whirled around in company and vanished together from view at the bend of the river.

"Here we are engaged, Mavra," said the carpenter. "Let it be once for all."

"No," she replied calmly, without blushing.

"Why? Do you dislike me?"

"No, not more than other people. I don't wish to marry."

This was enough to make the carpenter persist in his wish. He tried every means—went the length of begging the countess to intercede for him. Mavra, sent for by her mistress, gave the same explanation.

"Well, if the child does not wish to marry, leave her alone," said philosophically the excellent lady, who would have scrupled to force a fly to drink a drop of milk.

And Mavra by her own desire was devoted to celibacy.

In the month of September Serge returned, but only for eight days. He brought no dogs nor equipages with him this time. When he saw Mavra he gave her a friendly smile, and then thought no more about her. When he went away his mother accompanied him, and the house was again plunged into solitude long before the usual time. Six weeks later the news arrived that the young count was married.

This announcement was the signal for great rejoicing. According to ancient usage barrels of sweet beer and hydromel were brewed; white bread and meat were distributed to the whole village. The poor had abundant alms, and the whole retinue of servants had new dresses. Mavra had a handsome blue woolen dress and a silk handkerchief. No one was forgotten; debts in arrear were remitted, and the young girl was suddenly told she might return for the winter to her family till her father could make new arrangements for the payment in kind of what he owed.

This was no joyful news for the young peasant girl, but resignation is an inherent Russian virtue; she packed up her clothes in a basket, and one fine morning courageously set out on foot for her native village. She was received coolly by her mother. One month more to feed! besides which, peasants are sparing of their demonstrations of affection. After a few days Mavra relapsed into her old habits, bent all day over her embroidery frame by the narrow window, in the evening standing leaning against the door, gazing, as was her wont, at the stars. More than ever she loved them; behind these marvelous lights, that she likened to tears—for she was often sad now—she saw the black eyes and handsome indifferent face that had taken possession of her soul. As long as she was staying in the grand seignorial mansion; where the image of her idol met her at every step in familiar attitude, where she had only to close her eyes to see Serge before her, Mavra was happy; she was of those for whom the innocent and daily presence of the beloved makes the whole happiness of life. Here, where nothing spoke of him, she felt for the first time the pain of separation. Uneasy, she asked herself what it was that was torturing her to this degree, and the truth nearly dawned upon her. But she stopped the thought, not daring to sound it further, saying to herself that there must be at the root of all this suffering some great sin she herself was ignorant of. Morning and evening she knelt long before the sacred image, imploring God to deliver her from her pain, and feeling herself soothed by this effusion of mystic tenderness, she kept her sadness to herself, still refusing to fathom it. But she was visibly wasting away; the smoky atmosphere of her home had now the same painful influence upon her that the want of fresh air had formerly when she first left her village. She passed the winter suffering, uncomplaining, unrelaxing in her work. Gradually she gave up looking at the stars. Not only did they more than ever look like tears, but no sooner did she turn her eyes toward the bright sky than they filled with tears, so that she hardly knew whether it was the fires of heaven or her own tears that sparkled beneath her eyelids.

Spring came, though more tardy than usual; then summer, with its field labors. The countess seemed to have forgotten Mavra, who thought with even more and more resigned sad- [illegible] to send on Mavra by the convoy which every year about this period brought to St. Petersburg fruits, preserves, salt provisions, linen, and, in short, all the products of the earth. The young girl once more packed her clothes up in her little basket and took her seat on one of the long file of heavy wagons that slowly rolled along the roads for eight or nine days, she sleeping at night under the linen awning drawn over the chests of preserves, while the horses were in the stables and the wagoners by their sides. Sometimes on awaking she saw the stars, but they no longer brought tears to her eyes.

When the convoy of provisions arrived, and Mavra, still dizzy, had made the necessary change in her dress, she was led into the room of the young countess, where the whole family was assembled, augmented within the last two days by a superb new-born baby, which none of the servants knew how to manage.

"Here you are, Mavra? Good morning!" said the triumphant father, taking up his son in his awkward arms, at the risk of making him roar still louder. "You have a light hand and a gentle voice. I give you my son to take care of."

"I humbly thank you," said the young girl, pale with joy. "I shall do my best."

She carried the infant to an adjoining room, where she soon learned the special care to be given to a child of noble race, which was as different from its cradle from that of little peasants, his brothers in God's sight, as he would be the rest of his life. Toward evening the young mother, surprised at no longer hearing the music her first-born had already had time to accustom her to, sent Serge to find out the reason of this unusual silence. The young master entered the large dark room where Mavra was slowly pacing up and down, the child's cheek pressed against hers, warming it with her warm breath and the love of a heart henceforth happy. She was singing a peasant lullaby in a low voice, inventing words to the tune. "Dear child of my master, sleep on your servant's heart, that loves you, a treasure more precious than all things, my joy, my share of happiness in this world—my little star——"

Serge returned on tiptoe to his wife.

"I think our minds may be quite at ease," said he.

Mavra is now old. She declares that she has always been perfectly happy.—Henri Greville. Translated in Belgravia.

OLD LETTERS.

It seems but yesterday she died, but years
Have passed since then; the wondrous change of time
Makes great things little, little things sublime,
And sanctifies the dew of daily tears.
She died, as all must die; no trace appears
In History's page, nor save in my poor rhyme,
Of her, whose life was love, whose lovely prime
Passed sadly where no sorrows are, nor fears.
It seems but yesterday; to-day I read
A few short letters in her own dear hand,
And doubted if 'twere true. Their tender grace
Seems radiant with her life! Oh! can the dead
Thus in their letters live? I tied the band
And kissed her name as though I kissed her face.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Kiss the Children Good-Night.

Send the little ones to bed in a happy frame of mind. It requires some discipline and self-denial on the part of a weary parent to answer all the foolish questions and attend to the many wants that multiply so fast as the hour of bed time draws near, but it is a labor of love that will bring a large recompense. Children never forget. They will carry with them through life's long and weary pilgrimage the remembrance of the face that bent over them at night, and that was ever associated in their immature minds with heaven and God. And the little tiresome last questions mean so much to them. What if we should not answer them and they never awakened here? Unanswered questions and unanswered problems have followed men and women through life with harrowing persistence. And never give a thoughtless answer to a child's question. Never tell the little ones that the thunder is the voice of God! Think what an idea they must form of such a God. Do not tell them petty vague stories that will mislead them into tangled paths. Hood says pathetically of his own childhood:

I remember, I remember
The fir trees dark and high.
I used to think their slender tops
Were close against the sky.

It was a childish ignorance,
But now 'tis little joy
To know I'm further off from heav
Than when I was a boy.

No one can so gently and kindly prepare the little ones for the perplexities and disappointments of life, which are inevitable, as the fathers and mothers to whom their education should be a first consideration. The moral lessons taught at the mother's knee or by the bedside can never be forgotten, nor can the father shirk all responsibility in the matter of home tutelage. That is a child to be pitied who is afraid to ask its father any question which arises in its young mind; who dare not climb to the parental knee and challenge the world to dislodge it. Dr. Holland, in his fine poem of Daniel Gray, which is said to typify his own father, says:

He had some notions that did not improve him,
He never kissed his children, so they say.

We feel sorry for the children of a father so austere, but we can afford to pity one who lost so much beauty and value out of his own life. Then kiss the children good night and good morning and answer all their questions, and you will find that in such work two are blessed—one in giving, the other in receiving.

Bric-a-Brac.

Cabinets in larger houses are found only in reception rooms or libraries, where the back parlor forms the library. Very often they are of combination style, and the most popular form of libraries to-day is that which presents the convenience of a book case and cabinet in one. In a framework of carved or ornamental woodwork, shelves form the center, and small alcoves at either side serve for the reception of ornaments. Some of the most beautiful specimens to be seen in the city are copies of old sixteenth century cabinets, which, however, are only suitable for rooms where everything can be made harmonious with them. It is quite strange to note the different effects an antique piece of furniture has in a store and when it is transferred to a modern apartment. All at once its rich, dark carving seems to have lost its effect, the article which, in the upholsterer's domain, surrounded by others of its kind, was unique and seemed priceless, appears to decided disadvantage in a room full of the latest specimens of nineteenth century manufacturing skill. It is like an old-fashioned child, and so well is this understood to-day that perfect copies of old world furniture are rarely made; they are at best adaptations of old ideas to the modern standard. So we find to-day that while the Moorish is the style most in demand it is so adapted and conventionalized by the introduction of beveled mirrors and other modern innovations that it can insinuate itself into the most elaborate nineteenth century reception room without appearing incongruous. These Moorish cabinets are very handsome. In many the effect is greatly heightened by the use of drapery. The archway which usually surmounts the structure is often decorated with hangings of embossed velvet or plush, which serve to relieve the severity of the outlines.

Much-Lectured Mothers.

There is a suggestive story told by Helen Campbell of Lydia Newman, whose old Quaker uncle seeing that she fastened her pretty little Newport ties with poppy red ribbons, frowned and told her it was not seemly. "I don't care for them myself," she said, "but I want my little boy to remember that his mother wore [illegible] man or woman. They were probably unnoticeable, also; but the boy discovered a morbid dread of appearing in them, as they were not a usual addition to his toilet. He confessed, in confidence, to his mother, as they walked along, that he dreaded the remarks his Sunday school class would make upon them. How little consideration is shown for the feelings of children. How few parents realize that the child's world, only, as John Brown of Edinburg said, "about three feet high," has its tragedies and comedies, its fear of blighting, adverse criticism. So many times, when garments are chosen, when the question is not of expenditure, but of taste, the children themselves might be allowed to choose, within certain limits, what they will have. Who has not seen this sight; when all the happy boys in the neighborhood are wearing knee-pants, one small and weary soul appearing in pantaloons the exact counterpart of his father's and reaching to the heels of his shoes! This life is made a burden to him, and then and there is begotten an uneasy consciousness of self that will require years of thought and experience and of resolute care to overcome. The consciousness of being well and suitably dressed, so dear to the heart of woman and so conducive to her ease, is just as consoling to a child, and is no more likely to lead to a morbid fondness for dress than is the discomfort occasioned by the consciousness that there is something wrong about his clothes.

Lady Wilde on the Carlyles.

Mrs. Carlyle failed to reach happiness because she had ambition without fame, and intellect without a career, and was too self-conscious and proud to be content with a subordinate part in life. She ought to have considered that her existence was really of no importance to the universe; but her husband's worth and works had power to send the world on its path of progress with mighty tangential force, and to drive a current of new life into the heart of the century. He was necessary to humanity; but she was only necessary to smooth the path his soul traveled. In this line of duty lay the beautiful mission of a loving wife, and in this she ought to have found happiness, but she only thought of the small annoyances that lay in her own path, and pronounced herself "miserable"—though holding the proud position of wife to the greatest man of the age. Yet she loved him as well as her nature would permit; but egotism can never nobly worship nor see the glory through the mist. All the trials that made her "miserable" resulted more from faults in her own disposition than from her husband's temper. Had she married the village schoolmaster, she might have been happier. A keen, clever, homely Scotchwoman, with her sharp tongue and her broad Scotch accent, would have ruled the parish admirably. This should have been her destiny; but Carlyle raised her to eminence as his wife, gave her station and dignity in the great capital of the world; and in return she darkened his fame, gave his name to the scoffers, and chilled the enthusiasm that would have raised memorials to his honor.

Something to Her Credit.

Mrs. Langtry, as she is everywhere called, has left a bitter feeling behind her in the minds and hearts of the men whose business it is to make styles and sell them. A sort of unpleasant odor lingers about her name in New York, and she would not feel flattered to hear all they say of her. And it has nothing to do with her penchant for Freddy, strange to say. It is all on account of that jersey and that turban which she wore over here and thereby started an inexpensive craze. "She came here in her infernally scant unembellished clothes," said one man in a rage, "and we lost thousands of dollars, as every woman straightway put on a jersey and a plain hat. Why couldn't she do something for us while she was about it, and set fashions that would bring money into the country instead of taking it out?" "Do you honestly mean to say that our independent American women followed Langtry to the extent of affecting the revenues of the United States?" "That's exactly what I say. It got to be the fashion when she first came to wear plain hats and plain dresses. She was made to give her opinions, which were as silly as any spoiled woman's, and she thought the great fault of our women was that they dressed too conspicuously in the streets, were too fond of bows and streamers of ribbon. Things took a drop after that, and we felt it. Why couldn't she be an enterprising woman, with an eye to business, like Bernhardt. Now that lively little meteor brought out long gowns, rare laces in cataracts and jabots, and a long, wrinkled kid glove, peculiar to herself, and this glove immediately became all the rage, and in consequence all the manufactories in the world were set to work making."

Children at Table.

Robert Collyer once, when lecturing to a country audience, contrasted the strictness of the old days and the laxity of the present time, and, while commending the latter, made this remark: "Let the children begin at which end of dinner they please." A young mother, who hung on his words of wisdom, treasured this particular saying, and a few days after proceeded to put it in practice, but somehow it did not seem so sensible at midday, and she was herself reminded of Mr. Browning's line that "colors seem by candle-light are not the same by day"; but with the mild persistence of her sex, she would not abandon the stand she had taken without a good deal of argument. "Where is the harm in giving the child his piece of pie or dish of pudding first, if he prefers it in that way?" she asked herself, and she did not get a very definite reply; but when she turned, as every wife should, to the acknowledged head of the house, she was at once enlightened. Of course the child would prefer the sweets first, and his appetite for the more nourishing and substantial part of the meal would be diminished. This is the reason why even a cookie a little while before dinner is not conducive to health. After more thought the mother arrived at the conclusion that the pretty theory must be given up, and she instituted a rule that never between meals should one of the children have anything, unless he or she were hungry enough to demand bread and butter without sugar.

Greek Dress for Modern Women.

"Oh, for a return to the Greek style of dressing," sighed a young man at a charity ball. The speaker looked like anything but an æsthete, and I forthwith endeavored to ascertain his views. "The usual Greek costume," he said, "would be a practical impossibility in this climate. But a modification of it, or a dress constructed upon its fundamental principles, would be far more becoming than the majority of dresses worn to-day. Look around here on the floor, for instance; the dresses that strike me as being prettiest, most graceful and best adapted to make a woman appear attractive are those that approach the nearest to the Greek. Notice the contrast between those two; equally costly no doubt, equally pretty material, and, in my judgment, equally pretty women. But the dress of the one, a round-skirted, stiff, barrel-like affair, moves in as inflexible manner as a bell at every motion to the upper part of the body. See the bell swing as the dancer goes through the waltz. But the others wears a dress that falls loosely in the most graceful lines, following the form just closely enough to give definite shape and proportion, and at every new movement of the wearer the dress assumes new lines of beauty. In other words, she has a flexible grown—one that will look well in repose, in action, sitting, reclining or standing. The other will serve only for a statue."

"But would you advocate the adoption of the Greek style of male attire?" I asked.

"No," he answered doubtfully; "though it might serve admirably for state or dress occasions. But the ordinary man's life is such as [illegible] trimmed with applique figures. This last style is especially effective when the skirt is of ottoman silk, matching the ground of the brocade, the effect being that of an embroidered jacket with silk embroidered to match.

A Happy-Go-Lucky Family.

The best chance, perhaps, of domestic felicity is when all the family are Bohemians and all clever, and all enjoy thoroughly the erratic, impulsive, reckless life of work and glory, indifferent to everything save the intense moments of popular applause. Such a family may be met in the art circles of Paris. The mother had been a model and a beauty, and still posed as Hebe when she handed a cup of tea to a visitor. The daughters, handsome, brilliant and clever, as the children of artists always are, sing, act, recite, dance, dress better than any one else. Everything looks picturesque on them. Fashionable ladies vainly desire the pattern of that flowing train, that lifted robe, that classic sleeve; but no pattern is to be had. All was arranged by the aid of a few pins in the caprice of the moment, as the handsome girls chatted and laughed before the mirrors in their little room. Youth, beauty and artistic taste can work wonders with the most chaotic materials. People asked how they managed to pay for everything; but they never paid. That was their magic secret. Bills, of course, were endless; but when some particularly severe creditor appeared, one of the splendid daughters pleaded with such a bewitching smile that he would "call next Monday" (it was the family formula), that he retired humbled and abashed from the glorious presence, as if his claim had been an impertinence.

A Novel Piece of Headgear.

While at church last Sunday I, says a St. Louis reporter, stole a few moments away from my devotions to give attention to a hat or bonnet worn by a young girl sitting in a pew in front of me. It was such a novel creation of the female mind that I once felt assured the new idea would soon be all the rage. And it, no doubt, will. Looking like a cross between a shell hat and a poke bonnet, the head covering was nothing more or less than an ordinary palm-leaf fan of the cheapest kind. The handle was cut off and the fan pressed into shape for the head; at the top, near the stalk, was a bow of ribbons, and a few bright ribbons hung down behind. This was all, but the effect, with a bright face beneath the shade of the metamorphosed wind-agitator, was very pretty. The hat—or bonnet—whichever you have a mind to call it, could not have cost more than thirty cents, but it looked just as pretty on the little blonde head in front of me as a $30 bonnet could have looked.

Here's a Smart Child.

A notable young traveler left Brooklyn for Boston alone. This was Ida Volborth, ten years old, who left her grandmother's house, 182 Jay street, Brooklyn, to join her mother. About four years ago she went from Boston to Liepsic, Germany. At that time she spoke only English. In Leipsic she was continually in the company of friends who used only the German tongue. She had forgotten every word of English she ever knew. She cannot even ask for food in English. She was taken by an uncle from Leipsic to Bremen and placed in charge of the captain and the stewarders of the steamship Fulda of the North German Lloyd line. She had the address of her great uncle in Brooklyn, Mr. August Volborth, and had his portrait; the arrangement being that she should not be taken from the ship unless demanded by a man who could be recognized by the picture. The mother, who cannot speak German, preceded the child to this country one year ago.

Brides' Dresses.

Brides are prominent characters, and their robings, the styles that govern their dress etc., are a matter of interest to every feminine mind, and—sub rosa—occasionally to the masculine one also. To them be it known, cream and dead or pearl white no longer belong. The beautiful bride's costume must now have a shimmer of sheen enveloping it; and this fall the handsomest ottoman and brocaded white silks intended for brides' costumes have a silver sheen over them, and are called "silver white." Is there anything new under the sun? In the time of our great grandmothers "silver gray" was the most prominently regular color for brides' costumes, and can we do better than go back to the days when they tell us women decked for the bridal in silver gray, and entirely enveloped in a voluminous veil of tulle looked like the denizens of fairy-land who rise from the glens to dance in the morning mist.

Book Covers.

Adjustible book covers are exceedingly convenient; they protect an expensive binding, and they are also ornamental. The materials required are velvet or satin; sometimes fine all-wool cloth is preferred to either of these rich textures. The goods should be cut exactly the size of the cover, allowing two inches of the side and one inch at the top and bottom of the book. The edges are feather-stitched. An eyelet hole is worked on the end pieces, through which a ribbon or fancy silk cord is passed, in order to secure the adjustable cover on the book in a close position. Imitation hinges in fancy cloth stitch are wrought with embroidery silk. An artistic monogram needleworked on one side, and a pretty spray, or small design appropriate to the subject of the publication, should give finish to the cover, making the whole extremely ornamental and also useful.

Pschutt.

It is said that the contemptuous answer of the old chancellor of Germany, in the recent diplomatic tiff between that country and France, has given name to the fashionable bluish shade of slate color, richer than any shade of gray now worn, which is called "Pschutt" gray. This is the smart color par excellence, though every shade of gray, from Quaker slate color to silvery mist, will be worn. A single sea swallow's wings contains an infinite numbers of these shadow tints, ranging from the black gray, called by the French (heaven alone knows why) elephant's breath, to a pale, silvery gray on the side which clasps the breast. These wings are massed in groups on some French bonnets in a very unique manner.

Plumage.

Lady's cloth comes out under two new names—drap des dames when plain woven, and Wales cloth in compliment to the princess of Wales when woven en travers. A glove finish and softness of texture that is given it this year is admirable. In all the colors of the season, including the elephant and pschutt gray, the new Judic shades of red, Russian green and czar brown, the Wales cloth and drap des dames are recommended for suits that may be utilized for shopping, business, driving, and traveling costumes, when something more elegant and costly than the cheviot is demanded.

Watteau wrappers are much worn, and are specially becoming to tall, slight figures. They are certainly extremely comfortable, and, when made up in handsome materials and daintily trimmed with ribbons and bows, can be worn for a considerable part of the day at home. Watteau folds of handsome lace are now worn with black silk dresses upon small occasions.

Loose fronts are added to princesse morning dresses in a way that is very becoming to slight figures. They may be cut off at the waist like a sailor's blouse or be carried back on the hips in puffs or paniers. A velvet ribbon bow ties the collar just below the throat, and there is another bow with long ends at the waist.

Tasteful black and white dresses for dinner and evening at the seaside are made of diaphanous black gauze trimmed with jabots and frills of white Oriental lace. The pointed bodice has the neck deeply pointed also and filled in with folds of tulle. Pearls or rubies are the jewels for this toilet.

Simple and neat morning dresses of white nun's veiling have the skirt arranged in three graduated [illegible]

[illegible] dotted with them at intervals, and two or three are on the sleeves like a cuff.

Stylish and becoming costumes for out-of-town wear are made of sheer wool of dark color, with large round chenille wafers embossed upon it.

A novelty for quilted underskirts to be worn next winter appears in the shape of foulard silk, with a dark ground, and the pattern in bright colors.

Elegant evening toilets are now made up in large-patterned satin brocades, the figures, which are in raised velvet, being exquisitely tinted.

Black stockings may be worn with any summer dress and at any hour of the day or evening, with breakfast or with ball toilets.

"Pigeon's throat," "water-cress green," "duck" and "duckling green" are counted with new shades wearing rural names.

A CHINESE ROMANCE.

How an Outlawed Grandee Rescued His Almond-Eyed Love.

Chicago Herald.

"I am a noble, grandee-titled person, or what you may be pleased to call it, in my own land, but it would be nearly impossible for me to explain the rank, so we will let that go. It is sufficient to say that my father, like Gladstone or Blaine, was a party leader, and in the state service. I was early taught state intrigues and secrets. Then I had private English and French tutors, and received a thorough education. Now in Corea, which is the Switzerland of China, in one sense, the people are all born free men, and bold and daring. It was there I first learned to love a beautiful girl with every grace and charm that could be desired, but she was the daughter of a rebel. You must know that we have rebels like you have had. Sometimes they are descended from father to son. They hold forth in the mountains; then on the arid plains east of China, scouring the country much worse than the Bedouins of the Arabic region. I had been up in the Corea district on state business, when I met and loved Tsung-li. She was, indeed, 'soul's light' to me. I could not persuade her to fly. I would, in my mad passion, have left the kingdom, going to Hong Kong and endeavoring to get passage on an English ship, but she would not go. She thought of my honor and future, and I could not move her to compassion. Then the hope of my life seemed slipping from me, as the little stars elude the moon's admiring advance, I turned from her, and as she sank down on the rock beside which we had met, I looked not back, though her sobs rent my heart-strings.

"I went to my father's palace and told him that he must get me away from China. I was sent to our embassy at England, remained there several months in London, went through Scotland, crossed the channel to Paris, and sought in the contemplation of the gay sights in that pleasure-loving city, to drown thoughts of Tsung-li; but her beautiful face, with its tea-rose blushes and soft languishing eyes, came up at each turn, and I fled from the embassy without leave of absence, thus forfeiting my life to my country. I went to the West Indies, thence to South America. There I passed months in Chili, Peru, at Santiago, and Lima. I went around seeing the sights in the Liamo, and on the plaza, where were the tinkle of guitar and castanet of dark-eyed senoritas.

I had wandered all this time without hearing from my people, but the consulate here sent word to China that the new notorious Wing Sam Pah, whose head was worth $2,000 to his country, was in Chili. My father in a secretive way wrote me, I received his letter, and there I saw a mention of the capture in the Corean Mountains of Captain Hoy May, the great rebel chief, and his beautiful daughter. Good heavens! my Tsung-li in the folds of the enemy! I knew enough of state of affairs to see that she was liable to be selected by some mandarin. I could not stand it. I started for San Francisco, thence went via steamer to China. I went to a famous man of our kind at San Francisco, and he disguised me and got me a passport into the flowery kingdom as an agent of the Six Companies. I got to Hong Kong. I found out where the rebel and his daughter were confined, and went to them when I got there. I put up a job—there, that's American. I got Tsung-li out of her rocky prison, and then we started on our perilous task of escaping from the land. She had to dress in men's clothes. Together, hand in hand, we floated out to an American tea-ship on a piece of light bamboo wood. Then we were brought to San Francisco, and now we are here."

He ceased talking, and looking toward a small door at the right, softly called: 'Tsung-li, my own love!' The door was pushed aside, and a Chinese woman stood there. She was fair enough for any romance.

UNHAPPY SPAIN.

The Revolutions She Has Witnessed Since 1814.

A French paper publishes a list of the risings which have taken place in Spain since the year 1814. In that year there was a rising in Catalonia; in 1815 a guerrilla insurrection at Corunna; in 1819 a military conspiracy at Cadiz, which was followed in 1820 by a revolution extending over the whole of Spain, In 1822 there were riots, accompanied by much bleodshed, at Cadiz; an absolutist rising in Navarre and Catalonia; and street-fights at Madrid. In 1823 the French, under the Duc d'Angouleme, marched into the country to suppress the insurrection, notwithstanding which there were another military revolt in 1825 at Bihuega and further absolutist risings in Catalonia and Aragon in 1827. The constitutionalists rose against the government in 1830; and in 1833, after the death of King Ferdinand, began the first Carlist war. In 1834 and 1835 there were risings at Madrid, Saragossa, Seville and Barcelona against the clergy; several hundreds of monks were murdered and twenty monasteries burned. In 1837 military insurrections broke out at Madrid, Barcelona, Malaga, Cadiz, Valencia, Carthagena, Seville, Xeres, and San Ildefonso, and in 1838 at Bilbao, Pampeluna, and Irun. In 1840 Espartero made a pronunciamiento of that town and a military revolt at Madrid. Risings took place against Espartero at Barcelona in the following [illegible]

PITH OF THE NEWS.

Washington News Notes.

The counsel for Sergeant Mason, the soldier who attempted to shoot Guiteau, recently applied to the secretary of war for a copy of the judge advocate general's review of the proceedings of the court martial by which Mason was tried. The secretary refused the application on the ground that the document was a confidential communication. It is said, however, by the prisoner's friends that the secretary withholds the report because it is favorable to Mason and contrary to his own view of the case. Counsel will, it is reported, apply to the president for the full record.

The Levee Convention.

VICKSBURG, Miss., Oct. 2.—In the inter-State levee convention Arkansas and Mississippi only are represented. The following was adopted:

Whereas, The improvement of navigation of the Mississippi river and the fixing and preservation of its harbors and landing places is a duty devolving upon the national government, under the authority of the constitution, especially under the clause authorizing congress to regulate commerce among the States; and,

Whereas, The rapid development of agricultural pursuits in the territory between the Alleghany and Rocky mountains, the great watershed of the Mississippi has increased the flood height of the river, causing crevasses injurious to commerce and subjecting a great part of the valley to destructive floods; therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the imperative duty of congress to improve the navigation of the Mississippi and its tributaries so as to facilitate commerce by cheapening transportation for the great Northwest, and protect from destructive floods the territory now subject to annual overflow.

Resolved, That this convention deem it important that the question it is here to discuss should be constantly kept before congress and the people of the Union until the final object has been accomplished. We advise permanent organizations representing all the people of the valley and tributaries interested in the subject to endorse the plan of the Mississippi river commission, expressing a belief in final success.

The Last Flag.

"Talk about my war record," said an Arkansas orator at a political meeting; "my war record is a part of the state's history. Why, gentlemen, I carried the last confederate flag through this town."

"Yes," replied a bystander, "for I was here at the time."

"Thank you for your fortunate recollection," gratefully exclaimed the orator. "It is pleasant to know that there still live some men who move aside envy and testify to the courage of their fellow-beings. As I say gentlemen, my war record is a part of the state's history, for the gentleman here will tell you that I carried the last confederate flag through this town."

"That's a fact," said the man who had witnessed the performance. "He carried it so blamed fast you couldn't have told whether it was a union jack or a small-pox warning."—Arkansas Traveler.

LATE MARKET REPORT.

ST. PAUL.

WHEAT—As before said, the board of trade demand was slow at the close of the week. Early it opened active for hard varieties, with buyers bidding up and advancing prices, apparently independently of the lake markets, though these had some effect in afterward causing an easier feeling. There is a good milling demand, and a liberal through shipment trade. Among millers the feeling seems to be steadier than with the large shippers, who just now are offish. Latest reports quoted lower prices in the lake markets, causing dullness here. On Tuesday on 'change the market ruled dull, but at an advance of 1c on hard varieties for the entire week. Receipts have been liberal throughout and generally of good quality. Street wheat is still quotable at 87@92c per bu. Closing quotations on 'change weak at the following prices: No. 1 hard, $1.03 spot and October; November and December, $1.02; No. 1, 93c; No. 2 hard, 98c; No. 2, 88c—all bids.

CORN—Receipts and supply have been limited, causing strength in prices and advance during the week. The frosty weather has also strengthened the larger markets, sympathetically affecting values in St. Paul. Later the supply was a little better, but not sufficient to meet the demand, yet prices closed a little lower, in sympathy with other markets. No. 2, 48½c bid, 50½ asked; November, 48c bid; year, 46½c bid; May, 49c bid; No. 3, 47½c bid, 49c asked; rejected, 43c bid. Tuesday's sales: 1 car No. 3, 49c; 1 car rejected, 43c.

OATS.—Receipts have improved some, but prices have been well sustained, on good demand in excess of offerings. The market has been firm throughout, and so closed, the advance for the week ranging at ¼@1c on No. 2 mixed. Tuesday there was an active inquiry, and some pressure to buy for immediate wants, while futures received attention. More oats could be used in this market if sent here. Quotations: No. 2 mixed 28c bid; balance of the month, 27½c bid; November, 28½c bid; December, 28¾c bid; year, 28c bid; May, 32½c bid, 33c asked; No. 2 white, 29c; No. 3 white, 27c; rejected, 24c—all bids. Tuesday's sale: 1 car No. 2 mixed, December, 28¾c.

MINNEAPOLIS.

FLOUR—The exports continue light but the home demand keeps the market barely steady, the light production aiding in this. Minnesota patents are quoted in Boston at $7.50@7.75, and in New York at $7.25@7.50. Local quotations are: Patents, $6.10@6.60; straights, $5.20@5.70; clears, $4.45@4.85; low grades, $2@3.

MILLSTUFF—Bran and shorts have been scarce and firm all the week, closing strong. Mixed feed and coarse corn meal are low. Quotations: Bran, in bulk, $8; sacked, $9.50@9.75 per ton. Shorts, fine, $11@11.25; coarse, $10.25@10.75. Mixed feed, $17@18.50 per ton. Corn meal, bolted, $24; coarse, $18@19 per ton.

WHEAT—The fluctuations throughout the week were within a small range, and the market was quite strong until yesterday, when a decline occurred and the closing was weak. Early sales of No. 1 hard were at $1.04½ in store, but later there were sales at $1.04 and $1.03¾, closing with $1.02½ bid and $1.03 asked. Seller last half of October went at $1.04 and $1.03 was bid at the close. Seller November went at $1.04. No. 2 hard in A was offered at 98½c, with 98c bid. No. 1 Northern sold at 96c in A and at 97½c f. o. b. Some fine lots went by sample at $1.02, on track, and at $1.01 f. o. b. No. 2 Northern, in A, sold at 89c, and in B at 91c, with transit. Sales by sample were at 99c on track, at 95c f. o. b., and at 95c in store. The trading was larger in volume than for weeks. Minnesota State Bar Association.

The Minnesota State Bar association, which was formed agreeably to a notice given at the opening of the general term of the supreme court April 3 last, met in the hall of the house of representatives at 11 o'clock on the 2d inst. There were present prominent attorneys from all parts of the State. The meeting was organized by the selection of John A. Lovely of Freeborn as presiding officer and H. M. Stevens of Ramsey secretary. The object of the meeting was to canvass the names of applicants for admission to the association. Messrs. Williston of Red Wing, Heard of St Paul and Plumley of Litchfield, of the committee on admission, reported favorably on the following applications, the gentlemen thereupon being admitted to membership:

C. J. Bartleson, Minneapolis; Stanley R. Kitchell, A. D. Keyes, Faribault; L. E. Thompson, Stillwater; A. P. Fitch, Glencoe; A. C. Wedge, Albert Lea; William Barrett, St. Paul; A. V. Teeple, C. L. Catlin, St. Paul; Orris E. Lee, Stillwater; James O'Brien, Caledonia; George W. Walsh, St. Paul; Robert M. Palmer, Albert Lea; Thomas Simpson, Winona; H. G. O. Morrison, Minneapolis; E. Southworth, Shakopee; George C. Squires, St. Paul; Stanford Newel, St. Paul; J. N. Rogers, St. Paul; John W. Willis, St. Paul; David A. Secombe, Minneapolis; H. D. Hocker, Lake City; A. R. Capehart, St. Paul; John P. Rea, Minneapolis; John B. Atwater, Minneapolis; Frank P. Dorothy, Taylor's Falls; Judson N. Cross, Minneapolis; H. G. Hicks, Minneapolis; Frank B. Carleton, Minneapolis; Daniel Fish, Minneapolis; Charles N. Woods, Minneapolis; Charles H. Strobeck, Litchfield; C. H. Benedict, St. Paul.

The next meeting of the association will be held at St. Paul, on the first Monday in April, 1884.

Election Expenses.

Inquiry at the office of the state auditor, elicited the following estimate of the expense to the State rendered necessary by a general election. The number of polling places is not definitely ascertained, but without doubt exceeds 1,500. In an ordinary township expenses are as follows:

Fees posting three notices of election	$ 75
Fees making and posting registry lists	1 75
Three judges election, one day correcting registry lists	6 00
Three judges election and two clerks one day	10 00
Expenses conveying returns	3 00
Total for township	$21 50
STATE EXPENSES.
Polling places, 1,500 at $21.50	$32,250 00
Printed poll lists, etc., furnished by secretary of state	780 00
Express paid by counties on same	20 00
Canvassing votes by counties, $20 each, seventy-five counties	1,500 00
Total for State	$34,550 00

The additional expenses in cities largely increase this amount, and cannot be definitely stated, except that in St. Paul alone the last election cost $822, and at least an equal amount was expended in Minneapolis. When other cities are added, the grand total will not be less than $40,000, which is to be met by taxation.

The Elgin relief committee received from all sourcer $3,715, of which the sum of $3,502.89 has been disbursed, leaving in the hands of the treasurer the sum of $212.11.

Maud Graves of Grand Prairie was nominated for superintendents of schools by the Nobles county Republican convention.

Duluth lumbermen have found a new market—in Missouri and Nebraska. They have recently received large orders for lumber for the Kansas City and Omaha markets. This fact is said to have already raised the price of lumber along the Northern Pacific road.

At the recent session of the Carlton county district court, Judge Stearns dismissed a petition to incorporate the village of Cloquet.

The chairmen of the seven canvassing committees of the Ladies' Relief association Mrs. T. H. Bliss, Mrs. A. D. Leet, Mrs. H. M. Richardson, Mrs. E. W. Cross, Mrs. Garrett and Miss Mary Macomber, presented their reports at the meeting on the 6th inst. Between 90 and 100 families have been visited, and several cases of extreme destitution have been found. Many families are able to aid themselves if materials for clothing and bedding are furnished them, and they mostly appear anxious to be independent. A sewing company was appointed, consisting of Mrs. W. H. Hurlbut; Mrs. F. A. Poole, Mrs. H. C. Butler, N. C. Younglove, Mrs. E. A. Knowlton, Mrs. T. H. Titus and Mrs. G. W. Van Dusen.

Twenty-five bears were seen near Little Falls on one day by different parties, and ten were killed in four days.

Friends of Mayor Ludwig of Winona recently presented him with an elaborate gold medal, set with diamonds, valued at $200.

In Verdi, recently James Duffy was caught in a threshing machine, and his leg was so badly mangled that he died soon after.

The residence of Charles Fregeau of Superior was burned on the 1st inst., together with all its contents. The loss was small.

The man accidentally killed recently near Eggleston, Minn., by the engine of passenger train No. 4, proves to have been one C. D. Bliss of Ann Harbor, Mich. By letters found on his person, addressed, several of them, to Col. C. D. Bliss, it appears that he has relatives in Michigan, a son at different times having sent him money. Bliss had been lounging on the depot platform at Eggleston during the afternoon, and just before the arrival of the train proceeded down the track toward Red Wing.

Van Strum, the St. Vincent train robber, who pleaded guilty to robbery, has been sentenced to imprisonment for one year at hard labor, and has been taken to Stillwater.

The new $19,000 wagon bridge across the Mississippi at Brainerd has been accepted. It is over 700 feet in length, twenty-two feet wide and thirteen feet higher than the railroad bridge.

Christian Hoffman, the man who was recently lost in the storm, in the town of Drammen, Lincoln county, has not yet been found.

Items of Interest.

At last advices there were 1,909,382 widows in Germany—a supply greatly in excess of the demand.

The grand-daughter of Davy Crockett is living in San Antonio in feeble health, poor, and with three little children dependent upon her exertions.

A Vermont man, who stole a cow from his neighbor's barn, found on getting her home that it was his own cow, which his neighbor had stolen earlier in the night.

A Woodland, Cal., man took out two accident insurance policies, and then climbed a ladder to the roof to see if the hot weather was springing the nails from the shingles. He will get $15 a week on each policy for the next ninety days, and the accident insurance companies have barred ladders from the list of risks in Woodland.

S. B. Wagoner started to walk up Granite Mountain from Helena, M. T., on a pleasure trip. A heavy snowstorm set in, and becoming lost, he wandered around in the mountain for two days, when he managed to find the trail, and reached Glendale in an exhausted and famished condition.

A large, badly spelled placard was posted on a saloon in Ainsworth, W. T., last week, warning all parties not having any visible means of support, to leave town, and was signed "Citizens in Concus.

The little turreted apex of Mr. Tilden's new and palatial residence in Grammercy Place is surmounted with a bold American spread eagle in bronze.

The latest refrain of the Salvation Army is said to be: "If you can't get in at the Golden Gate, get over the garden wall."

Until a few nights ago Miss Annie Sterner, of Pottsville, Pa., had suffered from spinal disease, being unable to walk even with crutches. She dreamed that her health was restored and upon awaking she found the dream realized. She regards her restoration as a miracle.

General Abe Budford, of Louisville, said in relation to the unveiling of the statute over President Taylor's grave: "In case we had been successful in getting a military display, I had been asked to act as chief marshal, and should have worn the uniform suit that General Taylor had on at the battle of Buena Vista. But as things now go, I shall attend as a private citizen."

King Kalakau, of the Sandwich Islands, can get no groceries at the stores unless the order is accompanied with cash.

There are eighty-seven counties in Georgia where a man cannot buy, beg, or steal a drink of whisky, and none can be purchased in the state excepting in the larger towns. The people are fanatical on the subject, and in Mississippi they have gone to such an extreme that they tax billiard tables $1,000 apiece, under the belief that they are a device for the encouragment of drinking.

An eloping couple from Dutch Hills, Long Island, supposed the parents of the girl was in ignorance of their hiding place. They were greatly surprised, therefore, when one day, about a week after the marriage, the old gentleman walked into their abode and made them a present of $2,000, with which to begin life in good style.

At a recent family gathering in Palermo, Oswego county, N. Y., there were found to be two grandfathers, two grandmothers, six children, one brother three sisters, one uncle, two aunts, five cousins, three nieces, one son, four daughters, three fathers, three mothers, two fathers-in-law, three mothers-in-law, and yet the entire gathering only comprised ten persons.

About two miles north of Grand Ledge, Mich., in the heart of a large old forest, lives an eccentric but happy fellow named Dick Luke. His daily labors are devoted to the interest of a coal mine, which extends 500 feet into the side of a hill, and wherein, by the aid of the flickering rays of a lard-oil lamp, Dick Luke has for ten years past crouched on his side and back, and slowly picked the treasure from the store house of mother earth. The tunnel is only about three feet in diameter, and Dick's companion's are his long clay pipe and pick ax. About one and one-half tons of coal per day are extracted from Dick's one-man power mine, which is sold at the mine for $3.50 per ton.

It is stated that a large number of applications have already been received at the Home office for the vacancy caused by Marwood's death. The oddest comes from a man who professes to care nothing at all for the emoluments of the office, but is moved solely by a desire to introduce "refinement" into executions. Another bases his candidature on distant relationship to one of the Phœnix park murderers. It is said that in the village of Ecclesfield, Yorkshire, there are several persons who consider themselves qualified to fill the hangman's place. The correspondent of the Sheffield Daily Telegraph adds that one of these possible successors to Marwood "is using every exertion in procuring testimonials as to competency for the vacant post."

In August, 1881, M. B. Thum, of Newark, Mich., sunk two salt barrels in the ground, placing the top barrel about two feet below the surface of the ground, thus making the well eight feet in depth. Nothing unusual was discovered about the well until July, 1882, when fish in large quantities were found in it. Mr. Thum says that last year he fatted about $150 worth of pork by fish taken from this marvelous well. The water is muddy and the fish are lively and frisky. There are no streams or lakes within several miles of Mr. Thum's farm, and the only solution is that there is a subterranean passage from some river or lake to the well.

Imprisoned by a Bear.

From the Ogden Pilot.

Last Tuesday an old gentleman who has been engaged in hunting for some time past met with an adventure so thrilling and interesting that he became deranged. He was hunting near Bingham's Mill, in Ogden Canon when a deer sprang up and started to run down a canon. Being a good shot, the hunter soon rolled it over and proceeded to skin the same. He had progressed but a little when a large bear came rushing toward him. Again he levelled his rifle and sent a bullet crashing through the thick hide of bruin. Instead of killing the bear, it only enraged him and after a moments delay, more furiously than ever, he renewed the mad rush for the hunter. Seeing that his only hope for safety lay in flight, the hunter at once dropped his gun and ran along the hill until a friendly cave was discovered, and in this he took refuge. The bear was unable to follow into the black hole, but obstinately took a position at the entrance, which for two days and nights he maintained. Occasionally the hunter would emerge from his hiding place and look over, expecting the animal had taken its departure, but each time he returned disappointed. With the imprisonment came hunger and thirst, and finally the loss of reason. After forty-eight hours of waiting the bear finally left, and the hunter slipped noiselessly from the cave, and rushed as fast as he could to Bingham's Mill, where he was taken charge of, and with good treatment gained his reason and related his wonderful adventure. Search was then made for the bear, but nothing could be found of him, although the mouth of the cave was trampled hard where he had paced back and forth doing sentinel duty waiting for his victim.

A View of Washington Through Eye-Glasses.

There are many kinds and degrees of society. There is the official society, of which the president and cabinet are the titular leaders, and in which senators and representatives, when socially inclined, judge and diplomats, live and move and have their being. It need need not be said that the diplomats play a leading part here. They combine all the qualities needed for a social conquest. They carry about with them the distinction of men who come from "abroad." They are usually polished and amiable, sometimes accomplished and fascinating men. Gayety is a part of their professional duty. They have official positions, which fact counts for a vast deal in a republic. Then, on state occasions, they have uniforms, and, Sam Weller says, "It's the uniforms as does it;" though it must be confessed that the diplomatic uniform often seems to the ordinary American an extremely ugly costume. But the vague charm that hangs about a diplomat is beyond analysis. The petty attache of some unimportant legation seems to share it with the elegant representative of one of the first courts of Europe. The attache may be living on a pittance in a shabby hall bedroom somewhere, from which he emerges once a day in evening dress, and on rare occasions in his uniform. He may not have either family or fortune—not even good manners. But he is a member of the diplomatic corps, and that suffices.

Then there is another circle of official society—or series of circles. The center of each of these is apt to be the state association. For example, all the department clerks, deputies, commissioners and what not, from Delaware—Delaware will be a safe name to use—form the Delaware state association. Formerly these associations were political in their nature, but Mr. Hayes became convinced that all organization was wicked, and suggested that they disband. They then became social bodies, but some of them have resumed their political character. They have dances, etc. The members of congress from the state are likely to be leaders in this society, though they may not appear at all in the more fashionable official society. In fact, in that rarer social atmosphere, a member of the house of representatives is the exception rather than the rule. If he has been used to society, and likes it, he goes into it, of course. But the fact of his being a member of the house has little to do with his entree. A large proportion of the members are plain men from small towns or the country, who have known little of this life under the gaslight, are not comfortable in it, and seldom appear there.

Then there is the hotel society. The ladies staying in the Brown House all receive on the same day. Ladies calling can thus kill all the birds, socially speaking, there are in the Brown House with one handful of cards. The ladies of the Smith House have another day, the ladies of the Robinson House another. Then at intervals each hotel has a soiree invitations to which are generously distributed. There is a find band and a finer supper, and dancing unlimited. Congressmen and their wives and daughters, lobbyists, Southern colonels and numerous "generals" visiting strangers, politicians and the rest make up a mixed company. At one of these entertainments the wife of a congressman whose constituents had omitted to re-elect him, spoke sharply to a lady sitting on a sofa next to a friend of the congressman's wife. "You might move up," said she. When the lady had "moved up" and the congressman's wife had settled herself down in the room thus obtained, she turned to her friend and proceeded. "Yes," said she, "it's just as I tell Lycurgus. This Washington society unfits one for any other society. You can't go back to the society you were used to once—you can't. No; I tell Lycurgus, we must come back to the house. He says we can't but I say we can. And we must! That's all there is about it." A few months later "Lycurgus" is wrestling in the dust of the district arena for a recommendation. No one sees him engaged in that delightful occupation—red in the face, metaphorically speaking, hot and out of breath—knows that it is all because of the social aspirations of Mrs. Lycurgus, who has been unfitted by Washington society for the humbler society in which she once moved. If any man doubts that women rule the world, he can have his doubts removed in any circle of Washington society.—The Manhattan for October.

A Morman Habitation.

There stands on Third South-st., Salt Lake City, an oddly constructed house of two low stories, whose walls are covered with so many coats of whitewash that the nature of the material of which they are made is completely concealed. Plaster figures painted in brilliant colors, flaming curtains, and at the windows variegated fringes of tissue-paper contrast fantastically with the dazzling whiteness of the walls, and convince the spectator that the owner of the premises must be himself a singular combination. And so he is; indeed the inhabitant is far stranger than the habitation. He is a Norwegian Mormon, fifty years old. So far from having numerous wives, he has no wife at all, but steadfastly keeps a promise, which he made more than thirty years ago to a girl whom he married on her death-bed, that he would never marry again. He lives entirely alone, and admits that he is oppressed by the solitude of his home, to which he never admits a visitor. On several occasions he has felt inclined to marry, and the Mormon bishops have urged him to take that straight road to salvation, but the recollection of this promise has always interposed.

Under the law passed by congress at its last session reducing the postage on first-class matter from three to two cents per half ounce or fractional part, no provisions was made for local postage, which still remains two cents on first-class matter. In the forthcoming annual report it is understood that the postmaster general will recommend the reduction of this class of postage to one cent per half ounce; also that an investigation shows it to be practical without seriously crippling the revenue of the department. He will urge an increase of the weight of first-class matter that can be carried for two cents from half an ounce to an ounce. The postoffice department has been beseiged since Oct. 1 with communications regarding local postage, but has refrained from answering the letters until something definite can be agreed upon.

The New York Morning Journal says that "a man in Harlem is so fat that the shadow he casts is as round as a ball." He's pretty corpulent, no doubt, but there is a man in Norristown so fat that his shadow leaves a grease spot wherever it touches.—Norristown Herald.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

THE BECKER COUNTY CONVENTION.

THE OLD RING SMASHED.

Sletten and his Friends Endorsed.

Our Own Billy Norcross Nominated for Sheriff.

By the following report which the JOURNAL receives from the Convention held at Detroit on Saturday last, it will be seen who represents the feelings of the people of Becker County. The Record has stoutly maintained all along that Paul Sletten is an intermeddler in Becker County politics, and that the people of the county did not endorse him. We have only to add that every nominee of the Convention was a personal friend of Paul Sletten and that the defeated candidates were supported by the Record, to show how much the Record is esteemed in Becker County. We should not care a continental how Becker County affairs were run if the Record had not gratuitously offered a public insult to Paul Sletten and his friends a few weeks since by publishing a lot of baseless campaign lies. The following result of the Becker County Convention was sent us by a friend in Audubon:

"At the Convention held in Detroit on Saturday, Oct. 6th, C. W. Dix was nominated Chairman and the following officers were put in nomination by a good majority, viz: For County Auditor, Mr. A. S. Hunt; for Sheriff, Wm. Norcross; for Treasurer, T. K. Tergerson; for Register of Deeds, Hans Hansen; Clerk of the Court, W. J Morrow; Court Commissioner, G. W. Taylor; County Commissioner in the Second District, H. A. Bowman; County Attorney, O. L. Larson. The ticket will, without any doubt, be triumphantly elected."

Our thanks are due to the many kind friends who have called within the past two weeks to pay their subscriptions to the JOURNAL. Many are the kind words of encouragement that have been spoken to us, and to one and all we would extend our heart-felt thanks with the assurance that we shall do our best to merit the continued kind regards of our friends. In the matter of these subscriptions we wish to say to all who are in arrears that now that you have received a bountiful crop is a good time to drop in or send in the small pittance due for the JOURNAL. We have never been very exacting in the matter, and where parties have been unable to pay up in advance, (or for that matter for several years) we have been very lenient and tried to get along as well as possible and we think we have been very generous. This fall we need an entire new dress for THE JOURNAL and we trust our friends will all feel enough interest in seeing the desired improvement accomplished to aid us by paying up. We have enough subscription money due to procure a fine new dress for the JOURNAL and we sincerely hope to get it.

Great excitement was occasioned in our village on Wednesday morning upon the report that Andrew Murphy had the night before taken poison and was lingering at the very portals of death. Investigation revealed to us the facts, as follows: Tuesday evening Mr. Murphy became somewhat under the influence of liquor which together with other troubles, had prompted him to attempt the destruction of his own life. At his shop he had a bottle containing a preparation of laudaumn, and sugar of lead, which had been prepared as a remedy for some flesh disease. This preparation about three ounces in all, Mr. Murphy carefully shook up and deliberately swallowed. The dose at once began to take effect, and it being at once discovered what he had done, Dr. Duhig was at once sent for who proceeded to do everything in his power to relieve the foolish man from his fearful dose. This, after many hours of earnest work he succeeded in doing, and Mr. Murphy is spared, we hope to live a good long life of happiness and usefulness, until the great inevitable shall make the call for him to shuffle off the mortal coil.—[St. Vincent Herald.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

We are glad to hear Mrs. Sang is improving somewhat.

DeMers and Thompson's land has yielded 21 bushels of wheat to the acre, and 60 bushels of oats.

We understand that next year, Mr. C. B. Rockwood intends putting two steam plows on his 1000 acre farm.

Mr. J. B. Merrill came very near losing his separator on Wednesday morning. It appears that one of his men went down to light up the engine and found the straw all around in a blaze, but succeeded in putting it out.

We are glad to hear that Levi S. Myers, who farms about 1,000 acres at Neby, is now threshing out 20 bushels of wheat to the acre. Levi is well known as a thorough farmer, and his hard work is reaping him a reward.

Mr. Hugh Thompson, in company with the Hon. Marcus Johnson, and several other prominent men of the State, were furnished a special car for a trip to Duluth. They report a very pleasant time, on their return last Wednesday.

Basil Rideout, Mr. C. B. Rockwood's negro servant who met with an accident to his head a short time since, died on his way to the hospital in Indianapolis. This young man although of a dusky hue possessed a white heart, and by his faithfulness, endeared himself to all.

School commenced last Monday, under the auspices of Mr. Griffith and Miss Ames. Mr. Griffith is a man of scholarly attainments, and has brought the school into a good state. Miss Ames is all that can be wished for in a teacher, and the school board show their good sense in again obtaining her assistance. Miss Ames is very popular with her scholars.

On Monday afternoon last, Conductor Henry McMullen, of the C. P. R. met with a shocking death at Whitemouth. He was engaged in coupling cars when his foot caught in a frog, and as the train moved slowly on he was thrown on the rail, the wheels almost cutting him in two lengthwise. He was literally disembowelled, his head crushed like an egg-shell, and his brains spattered over the track. The remains were placed in a box and taken to Winnipeg, where they were interred. It is only about six weeks ago that a brother of the unfortunate man was killed at Brandon in a similar manner.—[International.

"Mr. James Creighton and Miss Annie Miller, both of Crookston, were united in marriage last night, by Rev. J. T. Davis at the residence of Mr. John Milne." Jim says that either the Plaindealer or Tier is away off its base as that interesting event occurred on August 6th.

Svenska Folkets Tidning

Of Minneapolis strikes for Hubbard. It says: A part of the Norwegian press has openly declared for Bierman. We can scarce imagine anything more reckless and shortsighted, as the Norwegians have nothing to win and everything to lose. It seems to us that our Norwegian brethren have been favored by the Republican party to a great extent; much more so than have the Swedes. They have a member of Congress, a State treasurer and innumerable representatives in less important positions; but still, they must needs have a Norwegian Governor! Had there been any possibility of electing Bierman we should refrain from charging them with stupidity, but it seems that they must understand this election is impossible and—that they are simply destroying their future chances with the dominant party by this chasing the splendid, but unobtainable phantom, exposed to their sight by their arch enemies.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON: THURSDAY, OCT. 11.

County News.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Bears are still numerous around town. Within the last week two have been seen within the city limits and one just out side.

Herb Mason, he of the P. O. News Stand, Crookston, was in this vicinity the beginning of the week, holding down his claim.

Miss Cassy Mix is rapidly becoming a proficient manipulator of the telegraph instrument. She has one at her home, and is practicing daily.

Mr. A. K. Dicken received his new Minnesota threshing machine, and is now prepared to shell out grain for the farmers at a lively rate and in a first-class manner.

A potato weighing 2 lbs 6 oz is on exibition at the store of Messrs. Berntson & Smidsang. The potato was grown by some party north of town whose name we are unable to learn.

Tom Harris, the Crookston building mover, came in on the train Tuesday, to make contracts for the moving of the bank building. Tom is the man for that kind of work.

The Indians are in town in large numbers. Some of them are in a beastly state of intoxication, squaws as well as bucks. If some of the parties who sell them whiskey, don't look a leedle ouid, the court house will fall down on them don't it? One would think that, with the frequent warnings to be derived from the calamity that has overtaken others for the same offence, that our saloon keepers would fight shy of the hilarious Indian.

Work upon the construction of the now depot at this point, is progressing rapidly. Already the building is all enclosed, and in about a week our genial agent, with his family, will occupy one of the neatest and most comfortable depots along the line.

We see Dr. Thomas on the street today. He is in town laying in supplies preparatory to the advent of the threshers. No amount of persuasion could induce the Doctor to give us an aproximate estimate of the number of bushels of grain he expects to thresh. We surmise that he is laying low until the rest have told their little story of large yields, and then eclipse them all.

Wheat is beginning to come in quite rapidly, and our merchants are correspondingly happy. The price paid to day is 83 cts. Most of the farmers who last year were compelled to haul their grain from thirty to fifty miles, know how to appreciate a home market. The buyer, Mr. E. H. Bidell is a pleasant appearing man, and will no doubt become a great favorite with the farmers. At all events all will meet with fair treatment at his hands.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

From Thursday noon to Friday morning at 8 o'clock Tom Gardner threshed, with A. C. Rhinehardt's Minnesota Chief, the grain from 160 acres, which averaged 20 bushels to the acre.

On Tuesday afternoon a farmer hitched his team to one of the telephone poles on Sibley street. A few moments after the team became restless, owing to the flies, and attempted to pull away. So frantic were their efforts that they broke the pole just above the ground, and started, but were pulled up short by the reins.

School will open in the new school house on Monday, the 8th of October, under the charge of Miss Sylvia Geer, with Miss Burr as first assistant. Both young ladies are residents of Grand Forks, and came highly recommended. We hope that parents will see the necessity of sending their children on the opening day, and give the teachers all necessary encouragement. As soon as the school board gets on its feet, a sidewalk, we believe, will be laid from Sibley street to the school, as it would be a shame to have the teachers and scholars trudging through the wet grass these frosty mornings. Serious results might follow.

On Monday the Pillsbury & Hulbert elevator received 3,380 bushels of wheat, on Tuesday, 3,200, and on Wednesday, 3,500 bushels. This is something unprecedented for East Grand Forks. Mr. Freemire is becoming very popular with the farmers though fair dealing and courtesy, and his efforts toward inducing the farmers to bring their grain to the elevator here, instead of hauling it across the river to Grand Forks, where not a penny more can be realized, is duly appreciated by our citizens. During last season much complaint was heard on all sides from the farmers, who said that they were not justly dealt by. This season we hear nothing but praise and good words for the manner in which business is being conducted.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Adolph Reigel's house has been plastered, chimneys built, paint put on, and altogether well finished inside and out.

The cornice is up on the north wing of the Kretzschmar block, and gives the front an exceedingly neat appearance. When the building is completed it will compare favorably with almost any in the Northwest.

Basil Emard, who lives in the upper part of Gervais township, informs us that wheat in his neighborhood will average 20 bushels No. 1 hard per acre, and that the potato crop is the largest and finest he has ever seen. A small patch about ten by twenty feet filled eight grain sacks, the potatoes all large and even sized.

Rev. Fr. Champagne left this morning for Red Lake Agency where he will remain until next week. He will celebrate mass at the mission church and otherwise labor among the Indians during his stay. On the 14th he will celebrate mass for the last time at the chapel of Our Lady of Lourdes, after that date the mission will be in charge of Rev. Fr. Dugal, of Terrebonne.

W. G. Slye is holding down a tiptop claim in township 140, range 40, one of the big 13, and is delighted with the prospects. He dropped into our sanctum while in town laying in supplies, to tell us the news. Settlers there are putting up substantial buildings, securing hay for their stock, and making all possible preparations for wintering comfortably. Mr. McIntosh has started a store two and a half miles west from Slye's, and another store is in course of erection at about the same distance east. Slye says most of the farmers have considerable stock, and that a large amount of breaking and considerable of cropping will be done next year.

Cyprien Gosselin, of Colchester, Ill., who was here two years ago, liked this country very much, but did not take a claim. He has just come back to take a look before going to Oregon, as he had some intention of doing, and when he reached Crookston was disappointed at finding so large a proportion of government lands taken up. After looking over the neighborhood of Emardville, however, he has finally decided to locate and has taken up government land there, and will at once bring out all of his family and connections. Emardville is filling up fast with a good class of settlers and will some day be among the richest neighborhoods near Red Lake Falls.

From the Gazette.

Mr. Gieriet can take the belt, as the most successful hunter in this district. He went out last Saturday afternoon and returned in the evening, with twenty-two prarie chickens, and nineteen yellow-leg snipes.

The boss thresher, Alex. Reberge threshed 7,905 bushels of grain in five and one half days, and pushed through in half an hour 103 bushels of wheat.

Mr. Carl Kretzschmar is receiving the machinery for his new flour mill. When completed, this mill will be one of the best in the state.

The St. John boarding house caught fire in the shingles on the roof on Tuesday. Fire was extinguished with but slight damage.

Notice.

I desire to inform the public that although the late firm of Haseltine Bros., has been dissolved, yet I still continue the nursery business on the old nursery grounds at Crookston, Minn.

I introduced the nursery business at Crookston in the spring of 1879, on land I individually leased in my own name from Mrs. E. C. Davis, and which lease will not expire until October, 1884. In the autumn of 1881 I individually purchased, and now own, forty acres of land within the limits of the city of Crookston, which is well adapted for nursery purposes, and on which nursery stock is now growing and doing well. I have had nearly ten years experience in the nursery business in Wisconsin and Minnesota, and claim that my experience in the Northwest has been such as to enable me to fully determine and advise what varieties of nursery stock is best adapted to this Northwestern climate. In connection with the foregoing I desire to inform the public that E. W. Haseltine has no distinct nursery at Crookston. That when the late firm of Haseltine Bros. was dissolved in June, 1883, the stock of the old firm was divided and, by agreement then entered into, I stipulated to allow the said E. W. Haseltine to leave his share of the stock on my above mentioned lands, and leased lands, and the said E. W. Haseltine has agreed to remove from my said nursery grounds all his share of the stock so divided, on or before the first of June, 1884, and, in the meantime, to pay me rent for the use of a portion of said mentioned lands occupied by a portion of his share of the old firm stock. Hence I am the proprietor of the old Crookston nursery.

Thanking the public for its former patronage, I shall continue to fill all orders addressed to me, trusting that by fair dealing and promptness I shall continue to have the confidence and patronage of the public.

[22-tf] F. T. HASELTINE,
Prop. of the Crookston Nursery.
Crookston, Polk County, Minn.

N. B.

To all whom it may concern:

The old Nursery is on Mrs. Davis ground instead of F. T. Haseltine's as above stated, and I am paying rent for the use and growth of my share of Nursery stocks upon said grounds, from this date until I am requested to remove my stock from her grounds next year to another plot for a Nursery. I will sell to all parties coming here for trees and shrubs at a much reduced rate. Residence one block north of court house. Correspondence solicited.

Very respectfully,
[21-tf] E. W. HASELTINE.

Ole Bang calls attention to the large stock of liquors he has recently purchased of B. Alexander among which are some choice old Kentucky goods which he is prepared to sell to farmers and others in quantities less than 5 gallons at wholesale rates. He invites all who desire to obtain a strictly pure and good article to call upon him at his sample room on Main street next to Eiken Bros., hardware store. [23-tf.]

Detroit Record: Probably the largest auction sale ever held in this county will be held at John Cromb's old farm, south of Lake Park, on Wednesday, Oct. 24th. Over one hundred head of live stock, besides a large amount of farm machinery, will be knocked down to the highest bidder. E. N. Jellum will swing the hammer.

The St. Paul Globe and other Democratic sheets are congratulating themselves that the Norwegians are all going to vote for Bierman because he is a Norwegian. That is not the case up here. The Norwegians have too much sense to forsake the Republican party to vote for a Democrat simply because he happens to be a Norwegian. If Bierman gets much of a vote in this Fifth District it will be from the Kindred crowd.

Puhler the Millionaire.

The following is clipped from the St. Paul Dispatch and a careful perusal will disclose the fact that Puhler has suddenly become the possessor of thousands. This will be glorious news to many of our business men who he left in the lurch when he went from Brainerd two months ago:

"Mr. Fred Puhler, the hero of the Ada Alert, the Brainerd Dispatch, and various other journalistic failures was met to-day and asked how his new evening paper was gtting along, said he: "I am going to occupy the field. I have already bought a press for $3,500 and materials for $4,500. This leaves me $3,000 in bank, which is all the capital that is needed with which to start an evening paper in opposition to the Dispatch. I may use more capital, later-on, but it will not be because I need it. I will make money from the start. I have one of the best business newspaper men in the country coming from Chicago; his name is McManus, formerly of the Chicago Herald, late of the News. I cannot get associated press reports, but I do not need them. I will hire a special wire to Chicago. I am not afraid of the competition of the Minneapolis Journal or the Tribune, or of Mr. Dick Dude Smith's new evening paper. I think Dude Smith wants to start big. And I think he is talking just to keep possession of the field. I propose to start right away, and hold the field.'"

It is supposed that Puhler's backer is R. W. Clifford. According to talk still another evening paper will be started in the saintly city by Richard Smith, Jr., who also intends to have a special wire to Chicago. It appears that there has been some talk of alliance between Smith and Phuler. In regard to Fred Puhler's scheme Mr. Smith says:

"If Mr. Puhler and Clifford propose to start on $10,000 they won't have much chance. I don't think I should want to form an alliance with him either, if that's the way he talks. The talk of it bespeaks the man."

For pure, unadulterated gall this interview certainly awards the medal to Fred. His St. Paul daily scheme will meet the same fate that the scheme he endeavored to set up here for the same purpose met. And should it materialize it will be as short lived as every other undertaking with which he has had anything to do. Puhler is too well known as a "dead beat" to ever gain the confidence of any community no matter where he goes.

The above article clipped from the Brainerd Dispatch, Puhler's last newspaper venture in the Northwest, shows the "high esteem" in which he is held in Brainerd. It was our duty to expose the fraud when he first showed his hand in the Norman County Alert and we then predicted that the time would soon come when he would be thoroughly known Republican County Convention.

The Republican County Convention met at the Court house in this city on Saturday, Aug. 18th. Called to order at 2 p. m. by P. J. McGuire, chairman of the County Central Committee. On motion Hon. Halver Steenerson was elected temporary chairman, and H. E. Cooke, secretary. The chairman appointed C. B. Rockwood, Peter Cornelius and E. A. Columbus as a committee on credentials who reported the following persons entitled to seats in the convention, viz:

Higdem—A. C. Rigehart, Eben Morgan.

Louisville—A. B. Gorham.

Terrebonne—John Clements.

Godfrey—Tosten G. Lee.

Liberty—Damon Dodge.

Keystone—C. B. Rockwood.

Tabor—S. Huggard, proxy L. C. McKnight.

East Grand Forks—F. J. Duffy, J. S. Dwyer, proxy J. H. Howes.

Vineland—Peter O. Saterno, John E Hanson, E. O. Estenson.

Onstad—Ole P. Onstad.

Fairfax—John Amundson, Wm. Marin.

Sletten—L. Foss, proxy H. Steenerson

Lowell—E. E. Lommen, O. K. Kvamme.

Rosebud—Thor. Haatvadt, proxy O. H. Lucken.

Gentilly—Louis Berthiaume.

Poplar River—T. Melitte.

Roame—Andrew Korstad, Ole Knudsen.

Crookston—Peter Cornelius.

Northland—F. E. Engstrom, proxy A. J. Hilden.

First Ward, city of Crookston—H. E. Cooke.

Lake Pleasant—E. A. Columbus.

Euclid—J. W. Crocker.

Kertsonville—Wm. Kertson.

Garfield—O. L. Hamery.

Bray—D. Bray.

On motion the report was adopted and the committee discharged. On motion the temporary officers were made permanent and the convention proceeded to the election of candidate for Clerk of the Court. After some skirmishing on the question as to how the vote should be taken the convention decided by the up-lifted hand to vote by ballot. The name of EDWARD A. COLUMBUS, of Lake Pleasant, was presented and the ballot being taken it was found that he had received every vote in the convention and he was accordingly declared elected. Mr. Columbus is a Frenchman who has been in this county for several years farming. He is a gentleman of good education and fully capable of attending to the duties of the office. For County Superintendent of Schools the present incumbent, MR. V. D. CARRUTH was nominated by acclamation. Mr. Carruth is too well known in the county to need any recommend from us. He has brought the schools of the county up to a high standard by dint of hard and faithful work and to him is due, chiefly the honor of having gotten up the first Teacher's Institute ever held in the county. He has been indefatigable in his labors in the interests of our public schools and his unanimous choice by the convention must be as gratifying to himself as it is pleasing to his many friends. The members from the Fourth and Fifth Commissioners District, after retiring for consultation reported the following nominees for Commissioners:

Fourth District,—Dr. L. Beaupre, of Gentilly.

Fifth District—C. B. Rockwood, of Keystone.

The following resolution was introduced and passed without a dissenting vote.

Resolved.—That in our present Executive we recognize a man eminently fitted for the high office he now holds; that we endorse his nomination, as characterized by wisdom and purity, and it is the sense of this convention that it is the urgent duty of every true Republican in the county to see to it that Governor L. F. Hubbard receives the full and hearty support of the party at the coming election. The County Central Committee, appointed at the last convention was ratified with the exception of A. Dewey, who has removed from the county. The committee now stands:

P. J. MCGUIRE, Chairman.
O. O. ESTENSON.
A. NELSON.
C. A. JOHNSON.
HOWARD LANCASTER.

Polk County Nomination.

A special reporter of The Herald came in late last night with the result of the Republican County Convention of Polk County, Minn., which met yesterday at Crookston. Halvin Steenerson was elected permanent chairman for the ensuing year, and S. O. Cook of the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, secretary. V. D. Carruth, the present incumbent, was renominated County Superintendent of Schools; J. Colombo, for Clerk of the District Court; Lewis Beaupre, of the town of Gentilly, for County Commissioner from the 4th District, and C. B. Lockwood, of the town of Keyston, for County Commissioner for the 5th District. Everything passed off harmoniously.—[Grand Forks Herald, Sunday.

It was indeed lucky for the Herald readers that that reporter arrived on Saturday night as the report he gives would not have kept over Sunday. As it is it is so much addled that no one who was in the Polk County Convention is able to recognize it as it appears in the Herald. With one exception, that of Carruth, the Herald's report is reliably incorrect.

"BATTLE OF THE BOOKS."

The "Literary Revolution" which caused such a sensation a few years ago and which was supposed to have been thoroughly overthrown and done for, seems to be "ablaze" again, more fierce and flourishing than ever. Its "100-page catalogue, free," and "books sent to any one to be paid for after receipt and examination, evidences of good faith being given," are now being advertised in thousands of papers, and it opens one's eyes to see the books offered—this time thoroughly beautiful typography and the best of paper, presswork and binding, instead of small type and cheap work, as formerly. And one must acknowledge that they are indeed "the lowest prices ever known." We quote a few samples, the books being always unabridged, and in large tpye:

Tennyson's Enoch Arden, 2 cents.
The Cotter's Saturday Night, 2 cents.
Cæsar's Commentaries, Cicero's Orations, and numerous other "Ancient Classics for English Readers," reduced from $1 to as low as 15 cents each.
Bacon's Essays, 15 to 40 cents.
Doro's famous Bible Gallery, $2.
Irving's Sketch Book, 25 cents to 60 cents.
Ancient Egypt under the Pharoahs, reduced from $15 to $1 25.
Scott's Waverly Novels, reduced from $30 to $7.50.
George Eliot's Works, reduced from $12 to $3.75.

And a whole host of the great poets of the world, ranging from 40 to 50 cents upwards; also plenty of other books equally interesting and astonishing to the old-time buyers. The books are sold only to buyers direct, and not through booksellers. Those who would be inclined to believe such claims fabulous, are confronted with the "privilege of examination before payment," and the witness of one's own neighbors on every hand who have already received their books. It is certainly worth a postal card to get the "catalogue free" For that address John B. Alden, Publisher, 18 Vesey St., New York.

"CHOICE LITERATURE."

The October number of this best of electic magazines contains in its 80 large double-column pages the following brilliant and instructive array of articles:

"James Ferguson, the Astronomer," from Blackwood's Magazine. "The Four Chief Apostles," by F. Godet. "M. Faye on the Shape of Comets," by E. S Dixon, "Women and Representative Government," by Millicent Garrett Fawcett, "Ralph Waldo Emerson: an Ethical Study," by Henry Norman. "The 'Why' and the 'How' of Land Nationalization," by Alfred R. Wallace. "Some Harmless Beasts," by Phil Robinson. "The French Newspaper Press," Cornhill Magazine. "In the Heart of the Vosges," Macmillan's Magazine. "The Emperior Julian's View of Christianity," by Alice Gardner. "On a Neglected Book," Macmillan's Magazine. "Papua, the Dark Island," Chamber's Journal. "Hibernation," by Rev. J. G. Wood, M A. 'Mr. Lowell on Mr. Fielding," The London Daily News.

Price only $1 a year, or 10 cents for a specimen copy. John B. Alden, Publisher, 18 Vesey St., New York.

He Had Vamoosed the Ranch

The POLK COUNTY JOURNAL says: "Jack Williams, barkeeper at the Odd Saloon, has fallen on hard lines. He yielded to the temptation to decamp with an overcoat and $100, but we are told, was arrested at Grand Forks on a telegram from Sheriff Zwickey. Jack is old enough to have known better." Jack wasn't too young to know enough to keep out of the way of Marshall Hennessey and his men. He came here, but before the telegram requesting his arrest reached here he had lit out for pastures fresh and fields more green.—[Grand Forks Herald.

We omitted last week to mention that the Norman County Index had captured a stand of colors and unfurled the Banner. In other words the Index had bought up the Banner and is now on a strong financial basis and is a good local paper with every encouragement for improvement. Since Puhler left that paper has been a good one.

LOCAL NEWS.

Don't forget that Knute Nelson speaks at Ericsson's Hall on Tuesday Evening Oct. 30th.

Mr. A. S. Gates has sold his farm in Andover to Deb Lytle for $2,000 cash and will go to Iowa.

Mr. G. L. Grey reports a yield of 17 bushels of No. 1 Hard wheat and 50 bushels of oats per acre on his Andover farm.

Max Ericsson and wife left for Chicago on Monday evening. Max informed our reporter that he intends to be away about two weeks.

Mr. Walter Letts reports a yield of 17 and 20 bushels of No. 1 Hard wheat per acre which he justly considers very good for this year.

Ole E. Rudi has struck a flowing well at a depth of 201 feet, on his farm in Fairfax. It flows about 200 barrels a day and Ole is now happy.

Wheat continues to pour in and the farmers' faces are wreathed in smiles though they know they ought to have $1 per bushel for their wheat.

It occurred last Friday morning, when the Rev. C. E. Page was away from home. When that gentleman returns he will find out that he is another father. It is a boy.

We received a pleasant call from Rev. R. L. Adams, the new Presbyterian minister one day last week. We believe that he is a man who will be well liked in this community.

The rain of Wednesday caused the threshers to quit pounding the No. 1 Hard for a day or so and many of them improved the opportunity to come to town for rest and refreshment.

Rev. A. W. Edwards took his departure for his new field of labor at Mankato, on Monday evening. We shall miss his genial smile and pleasant greeting upon our streets and trust that his successor will prove as fine a gentleman.

John T. Johnson, of Rindal, Norman Co., is another happy farmer who called this week to order the JOURNAL sent to him. He says that although outside of Polk County he must know what is going on within our borders and so must have the official paper.

G. L. Grey, reports that in one day and a half he threshed 2,000 bushels of wheat and 1,500 bushels of oats for Mr. Eugene Best, of Lowell. His machine was a 40 inch cylinder Minnesota Chief. The grain was raised upon 105 acres of land.

Mr. J. E. Mitton, formerly the jolly mine-host of the Crookston House, is up from Wahpeton visiting his many friends. He is the same genial, jolly Mitton and thinks he would be only too happy to be able to get back to his first love Crookston.

Mr. C. C. Utzinger now appears upon our streets with a smile that chases itself all over his countenance in quick succession all owing to the presence of a little Miss who made her advent into papa Utzinger's family on Thursday last. This reminds us of the numerousity of these items which we have reported for last week and it did not seem to be much of a week for babies either.

Mr. Louis Berthiaume of Gentilly gladdened our heart on Saturday by handing us the wherewithal for one more year's subscription. He reports 26 bushels of No. 1 wheat per acre, 40 bushels of which by stricken measure weighed just 47 bushels and 30 pounds. Mr. B. says that he followed the JOURNAL's advice with regard to thorough cultivation and that he thinks he owes his big crop to that fact. He says he would not be without the JOURNAL for double its price.

Horrie Jennings and Jud Carruth took the war path for geese on Saturday. They saw a large flock and crawling up within shooting distance the boys opened out in good shape. After firing away awhile and producing no impression, not even of curiosity on the part of the geese, they investigated and found to their disgust that they had been blazing away at some wooden decoy geese, and that they had planked five balls through one of them. However, ere they reached home they managed to shoot two fine healthy meat geese of which they felt justly proud.

Mr. Theodore Smith, manager of the New York Store, informs us that, owing to the death of Mr. Fixen and the sickness of the other partner, Mr. Hansing, it becomes necessary for him (Mr. Smith) to go to Racine to take charge of the business there. He will therefore, from this date sell everything now in stock at the New York Store until the whole is sold at and below cost. Mr. Smith regrets having to leave Crookston where he has made many warm personal friends and where he has built up a large business but as it is necessary he is bound to give his friends the benefit of these great bargains. Call and see what big bargains are offered.

And now it is Arthur Stewart who will have to be up o'nights singing "Bye, baby, bye-low" or words to that effect when he hears the gentle racket of his little son and heir in the dead watches of the night, and then he will begin to realize the responsibilities of a happy dad. But he will never believe it now.

At the business meeting of the Crookston Boom and Water-power Co., held at the office of Ives & Hattlestad on Friday evening last, a large amount of the stock was taken by residents of the city. There is still an opportunity to secure some of that stock and our business men should secure it at once so that Crookston may have the control of the enterprise which should always be a Crookston institution.

COUSIN ROLF.

BY HELEN FOREST GRAVES.

"Get out you old scamp!"

It was a brilliant July day, with skies of cloudless blue, the air scented with clover blossoms, and the brook wending its melodious way under green masses of peppermint; and Mr. Carey, who had walked a long distance, and had just fallen into a doze, under the refreshing shadow of a gnarled old apple-tree, started galvanically up at this ungentle address.

"Ma'am," said he, "I assure you I am not trespassing; I—"

But his apologetic words were cut short by the rattling of a stout stick on the stone wall, close to him; and in another moment a belligerent-looking red cow, came plunging through the high grass, directly toward his haven of refuge.

He started to run, but his foot catching in the gnarled root of an ancient tree, he fell headlong. The cow executed a hurdle leap over his prostrate form, and vanished in a clump of hazel bushes: and a resolute, bright-eyed woman, of some forty odd years, came to the rescue, with a flapping sunbonnet tied over her ears, and the stick balanced across her shoulders.

"Don't strike!" pleaded Mr. Carey. "I'm getting off the premises as fast as I can. I assure you, I didn't know I was trespassing."

Desire Welland blushed very prettily, as she pushed back the sunbonnet, and endeavored to adjust her luxuriant red-brown hair, which had broken loose from its pins.

"Oh, I'm so sorry!" she said. "It wasn't you I meant at all, sir; it was the cow who had got into the cabbage-patch. Did I hit you with the stick? But I never dreamed of any one but Bossy being there. Oh let me run home and get the camphor bottle!"

Slowly, Mr. Carey raised himself to a sitting position and then to a standing posture, slowly he felt his knees, elbows and collar-bones.

"I'm not hurt," said he—"not to signify, that is. It wasn't your stick, ma'am; it was the roots of this old tree. It's enough to startle any man; don't you see; to hear himself called—an old scamp."

"But it wasn't you I meant," breathlessly cried Desire; "it was the old cow. Won't you let me run up to the house and get a capcine plaster? Oh, do."

Desire was fair to look upon, in spite of her forty summers, with big black eyes, a laughing cherry mouth, and cheeks just browned with the healthful hue of mountain breezes. Mr. Carey felt himself gradually softening as he looked at her.

"No," said he, "I don't care for a capcine plaster. But I've walked a good way, and I should like a bowl of coffee if it's handy."

"Oh, pray come up to the house then," said Desire. "It's only a step across the orchard. Oh, that cow, that cow! We must certainly have her hampered after this!"

"Perhaps," said Mr. Carey, solemnly, as he endeavored to straighten the edges of his hat, "you know a family by the name of Welland who live hereabouts. Two old maids who manage a farm all by themselves. Very peculiar females, I am told."

Desire stood still and began to laugh, while the deep crimson suffused her cheeks.

"Why," cried she "It's me and Malvina. We are the Welland girls."

It was Mr. Carey's turn to flush and look awkward now.

"Oh!" said he. "Well, it don't matter. I've business at the Welland farm—that's all."

"Isn't it strange that things should happen so?" cried Desire, opening the gate into the dim, shadowy orchard, where scarlet lillies grew in the tall grass, and robins darted in and out of the drooping boughs. "There's the house. You can see it now. Malvina and I have managed the farm ever since father died. Philo—that's our brother—has a house and an estate of his own, and his wife don't want any single relations. But we've done very well every one says. There's the place. And here's Malvina!"

Miss Malvina Welland was dilligently hoeing sweet corn in a man's hat and boots. She was a tall, Amazonian sort of female, with high cheek-bones, hair cut short, and a masculine way of leaning on her hoe. She looked sharply around at the sound of footsteps.

"Is it the new hired man?" said she. "Then Desire, you may tell him that we don't want help that comes at this time of day. I'll have no eight hour men on my place."

"Oh, Malvina, hush! It's a gentleman on business."

In came brother Philo from the back yard, with an augur in his hand.

"Eh?" said brother Philo, a wrinkled, hard-featured man in a blue overall, and boots that looked as though they might have been carved out of lignum vitæ.

"Business? It ain't a sewin' machine I s'pose? or a new patent reaper, nor any of these labor savin' humbugs? Because—"

"It's about your Cousin Rolf," said Mr. Carey—"Paul Welland's son. He's come back from Australia. He requested me to come over here as I happened to be passing this way, and see what his relations would do about giving him a home."

At these words, Mrs. Philo Welland emerged from the currant-bushes, where she was picking the sparkling, ruby-colored fruit to make jelly. For Mrs Philo believed in picking her neighbor's fruit before she began on her own.

"A home, indeed!" said Mrs. Philo. "It's what I always told you, Philo! says I, that man'll be sure to come back some day, poorer than poverty, says I. And he'll expect us to take care of him then. But we've worked a deal too hard for our money—me and Philo—and if he wants to be supported, let him just go to the poorhouse. Paul Welland always was a rovin' creetur', and Rolf ain't no better, I'll go bail!"

Mr. Philo Welland screwed up his face into an expression of the utmost caution.

"P'raps you're his lawyer, sir?" said he.

Mr. Cary nodded.

"I act for him," said he.

"Then tell him," said Philo succinctly, "that if he expects we're goin' to support him, he's considerably mistook! We've always took care of ourselves; he can do the same! Come, Betsey, we'd better be goin'!"

"Philo!" cried out Desire; "how can you be so selfish? Rolf Welland is our cousin. If he is in want or trouble, whom has he to look to but us? Malvina you won't be so hard-hearted? The old farm house is big enough for our cousin Rolf as well as for us. You never would turn a sickly old man adrift upon the world?"

"No I wouldn't!" said Miss Malvina, thumping her hoe upon the ground. "Look here, stranger, tell Rolf Welland he's welcome to a home with us. We live plain, but we're ready to give him a hearty welcome. Tell him to come here at once. The sooner the better!"

"Women is fools," incidentally remarked Philo Welland, chewing a stalk of green currant leaves. "If you lost what little you've got, do you s'pose this relative o'yourn would raise a finger to help you? Let every man take care of himself, say I!"

"And who knows," cried Desire brightly. "Perhaps we can get him the district school to teach? I heard Squire Lemmes say that the new teacher wasn't going to stay more than a quarter longer."

"I'm glad you can afford to take free boarders," said Mrs. Philo acidly. "Me and your brother—we can't!"

"Do come in, now, and get the coffee," said Desire. "And a few late strawberries, Mr.—Mr.—"

"Carey is my name," said the stranger who had stood immovable beneath the fiery hail of this conversational episode. "That is to say, it is my name now. I chanced to make myself useful to a rich old gentleman in the east, who took a fancy to me, and left me his property in his will. The only condition appended was that I should take his name in addition to my own. And Carey isn't a bad name."

"Certainly it ain't," said Philo with watering eyes. "I only wish we had a few of that sort of old gentlemen out this way. I'd change my name half a dozen times a day if it would be any accommodation to 'em. So you're rich, eh? Betsey,"—to his wife—"if this gentleman would be so kind as to come and take dinner with us to-day—"

"No," said the stranger, in a clear decisive voice. "Will you be so kind as to hear me out? Carey, as I have already told you, is only my adopted name. My real name is Rolf Welland."

"What!" roared Philo.

Mrs. Philo scrambled so hastily to her feet that she upset the pail, half full of currants. Miss Malvina dropped her hoe; and Desire, who had just brought out a little saucer of late luscious, red strawberries stood amazed at this revelation.

"You!" she cried, "our Cousin Rolf! and I nearly hit you with the stick, chasing the cow, and half startled you out of your senses, and—"

"And taught me," said the bachelor, with a strangely-sweet smile, "that there is yet left a spice of unselfishness in the conglomerate called human nature. Cousin Desire, I thank you for the lesson, I shall not forget it!"

And before the day was over he had helped Miss Malvina finish her patch of sweet-corn and mended the defective fence-rails where the offending cow had broken through, besides stalking up the sweet-williams, and nailing the big rose-tree to the frame from whence its over-blossoming weight had dragged it.

"I declare," said Miss Malvina, "he's a real comfort about the place!"

"And he has travelled so much!" cried Desire; and he talks so beautifully! I only hope he'll be contented here?"

There was no sort of doubt about that. Rolf Welland Carey was very well-contented. He had always hungered and thirsted for the details of a home life—here it was to perfection.

But Mr. and Mrs. Philo were not so well suited. All their spasmodic efforts toward friendliness were checked with Arctic frigidity.

"It's too bad!" said Mrs. Philo, almost crying. "He'll be certain sure to go and make a fool of himself by marrying Desire, and we shall never get a cent of his money. Desire out to be ashamed to think of such a thing at her age!"

But Desire was only forty, and there are late roses as well as early ones! At all event, he married Desire, and the Philo Wellands were disconsolate.

"It's all our bad luck!" said they.

For they had forgotten all about the passage in the Bible that speaks of "entertaining angels unawares!"

Baby and Jack.

From the Chicago Tribune.

It has been going on for a year past. Jack is a carrier for one of the dailies, and his circuit takes in a house on Scott street. One day last spring a baby crowned at him from an open door on that street, and Jack tossed an apple into the hall. The next day the baby was watching for him and after three or four days the boy made bold to slip up the steps and pat the little chap on the head and leave the stick of candy he had purchased two miles away. As time went on Jack came to know that the baby was fatherless, and that its mother was pale-faced and hardly able to drag about. It was weeks before she spoke to him, but the baby took to Jack right away and was always ready for his coming. After the first week it was always clean-faced, but it was a good while before Jack roused up courage to give him a kiss and to ask for one in return. After that it was plain sailing, and the neighbors became interested. It was queer enough that a boy like Jack, having his own way to make and roughing it until he had become suspicious and hard hearted, should catch on to a little whitehead, and be more than a big brother to him, but that was what happened.

And something more. One day he brought up a quarter of a pound of tea and left it where the mother would find it, and this was followed by other parcels and articles. One day he missed the baby and crept into the hall to find that he had cried himself to sleep and that the mother was ill and helpless. Jack roused up the neighbors, and whatever was eaten in that house for the next two weeks was purchased with Jack's money. The mother could only thank him and weep. She could not speak ten words of English.

A fortnight ago, Jack missed baby again, and again he found the mother ill. Friends were with her this time and she did not suffer for care. A week ago there was crape on the door as the carrier went his round, and baby had been carried off by a neighbor. When Jack came around next day the mother had been buried and people were watching to tell him that the house was to be vacated and baby was to go to a distant city. He had been brought back to bid the carrier good-bye, and the poor and lowly people drew off with tears in their eyes, and Jack sat on the door-steps and took baby in his lap and smoothed his white head and kissed his red cheeks. Baby clung around his neck and seemed to realize that he was to lose a friend, and, as one who stood by expressed it: "Then baby cried and Jack cried, and the women put their aprons up and sobbed like children. When they finally took the child away Jack's heart was big enough to break, and throwing his arms around the little chap for the last time he turned and ran away and never looked back!"

Gas From Lime.

Much is expected from the improved method which has been brought forward for producing hydrogen gas; this method consists in decomposing, by means of highly heated caustic lime, a mixture of steam and naphtha vapor, or other gaseous substance containing carbon. This mixture of steam and naptha vapor is first passed through a superheater, after which it enters the converting furnace; this consists of an inverted V shaped chamber, which is filled with caustic lime through the opening at the top,—it is in two parts, with the object of having one portion cooler than the other. The contents of the chamber are heated to a high temperature by gas from a separate generator, and, this done, the mixture of steam and naptha vapor is admitted at one end—the hotter part—and passing through the lime in the first arm of the chamber, is decomposed with the formation of dydrogen and carbonic acid. the latter is subsequently taken up by the lime in the cooler portion of the double furnace, the lime in the first portion being too hot to enter into combination with carbonic acid and form carbonate of lime. When the temperature of lime, becomes so low that the decomposition is not effected, the flow of steam and naphtha is diverted into another simiilar furnace, and the carbonate of lime in the chamber is rendered caustic again by contact with combustible gases from the separate generator; thus the same lime acts continuously without removal from the chamber.

General Notes of Interest.

In the Chinese theater at San Francisco the members of the orchestra sit in a row on the stage, smoking their pipes, and keeping up a most awful discord. The "supe" sits at their head like an "end man" in a minstrel band, in his check shirt, and occasionally gets up and pulls off or puts on some piece of toggery for an actor, or moves a chair from one place to another, and then resumes his pipe and his cross-legged position as an end man.

The little village of Annsville on the Hudson has derived its existence for nearly half a century from the Annsville wire mills, which employed upward of 400 men at good wages. Recently the wire mills were destroyed by fire, and threw out of employment all the working population of the village. The proprietor of the wire mills decided not to rebuild, and last week leased Sharp's rifle works, at Bridgeport, for ten years where they will in future carry on their business. As a result the storekeepers of Annsville have been forced to close up, and the village is rapidly becoming depopulated. A more desolate looking place can hardly be imagined.

The vicar of St. Paul's Church, South London, is very indignant because a wealthy miller of the interior who had become converted to cold water principles destroyed all the wines in his cellar, including 150 bottles of "fine old port." The vicar, in a letter to a blue ribbon friend, remarks: "I could have told you of a parish of 6000 poor, where several invalids are languishing, to whom a couple of glasses of such wine daily would mean life, and in some cases a mother's life. As for yourself, I leave you to your ecstatic dream; but if there should be any more 'wealthy millers' or others anxious to relieve themselves of a few dozen, or even a few bottles, of 'fine old port' or other wine I shall be thankfully happy to receive the same for my many sick; and if its medical administration be a sin, I am quite prepared to be a sinner."

Nobody has yet ventured to explain why there is no entrance to the new Philadelphia postoffice on Chestnut street, but meantime it has been discovered that there is none on Market street, and there is coming to be much wonder expressed that the architect did not forget to put an entrance on Ninth street. There is, however, a capricious rear exit to a neighboring restaurant, which is evidence that the architect was not entirely out of his mind when he made his plans.—Lancaster (Pa.) Intelligencer.

Strength of Iron Pillars.

In an extended article on this subject, the Building News, London, states that, comparing the strength of two iron pillars of the same height and diameter, one solid and the other hollow, the latter has the advantage of being economically stronger, the solid column is stronger than the hollow one of the same external diameter, but the lesser area is more effective than the greater, because the central portions of the solid pillar are less useful in resisting the bending force than the metal, in the circumference of the hollow pillar. If, however, the quantity of material in both the solid and hollow column of equal height be the same, the hollow pillar is by far the stronger, this being demonstrable by a simple geometrical construction, by one to proportion a hollow column of the same area as that of a solid one, by one of the diameters being given. It is shown, in fact, that hollow columns of the same area of metal as a solid one, may be made to any larger diameter, their strengths increasing proportionately, until a limit is reached by the shell of the metal becoming too thin to insure a sound casting. It is stated that a hollow pillar nine inches in external diameter, having an internal diameter of 8.062 inches, and a thickness of metal of 0.47 inch, or about one-half inch, is five and one-half times stronger than a solid pillar with the same quantity of metal. The practical limit in manufacture is said to be a thickness of one-fourth inch.

A DETECTIVE'S EXPERIENCE.

His Successful Undertaking and Escape From an Impending Fate.

(Buffalo, N. Y., News.)

One morning several years ago, just as the dull gray light was beginning to show itself in the east, a small band of men might have been seen employed about a house on Ferry street, in Buffalo. There was nothing special either in the dress or appearance of the men to indicate their intention, but it was plain that they had business of importance on hand. Suddenly a man appeared at one of the windows, took in the situation at a glance, and, swinging himself outward with wonderful quickness, scaled the roof of the house. This man was Tom Ballard, the notorious counterfeiter; and, armed to the teeth and fully realizing his situation, he defied justice and the officials below him. Some of the officers, knowing the desperate character of the man, proposed to shoot him until he was killed, but one of the number promptly protested, and declared that if his brother officers would assist him to ascend he would capture the man alive. Accordingly he began the difficult and dangerous task, and succeeded in bringing his prisoner to the ground in safety.

The man who accomplished this task was Mr. Thomas Curtin, the present superintendent of city police of Buffalo, N. Y. Mr. Curtin is a man who is known by every prominent detective and policeman in America, and he stands pre-eminently in the front rank of his profession. Quiet and gentlemanly in appearance and manners, he possesses a courage, combined with marked physical powers, that make him the terror of evil doers and the pride of law-abiding citizens. Few people can realize, however, the trials, exposures, and even privations to which the members of every municipal police and fire department are exposed. Compelled to be on duty at uncertain hours, subjected to the most inclement weather, and often necessitated by the nature of their duties to protracted undertakings, they endure a nervous and physical strain that is terrible. Such was the experience of Mr. Curtin in former days; and it is not surprising that he found himself suffering from a mysterious physical trouble. In relating his experience to a representative of this paper he said:

"At times when I was on duty I would feel an unaccountable weariness and lack of energy. My appetite was also uncertain and my head seemed dull and heavy. I did not fully understand these troubles, but supposed as most people suppose, that I was suffering from malaria. I tried to throw off the feeling, but it would not go. I thought I might overcome it, but found I was mistaken, and I finally became so badly off that it was almost impossible for me to attend to my duties. I have known any number of men in the police and fire departments of this country who have been afflicted as I was, and I doubt not there are to-day hundreds similarly troubled who, like myself, did not know the cause, or really what ailed them.

"Your present appearance, Mr. Curtin, does not indicate much physical debility," said the interviewer as he looked at the 220 pounds of bone and muscle standing nearly five feet eleven inches in height before him.

"O, no; that is altogether a thing of the past, and I am happy to say that for more than a year I have enjoyed almost perfect health, although I now realize that I was on the road to certain death by Bright's disease of the kidneys and traveling at a very rapid pace."

"How did you come to recover so completely?"

"That is just what I want to tell you, for I believe it may be of great service to many others in my profession, who may possibly hear of it. I began the use of a popular remedy at the earnest solicitation of a number of friends in this city, and found to my great gratification that I began feeling better. This feeling continued and I gained in strength and vigor until now I am perfectly well—and wholly through the instrumentality of Warner's Safe Cure which I believe to be the best medicine for policemen, firemen, railroad men or any other class of people exposed to danger or a change of weather, ever discovered. Since my recovery I have recommended it everywhere, and never knew a case where it failed either to cure or benefit. I would not be without it under any consideration, and I am positive it is a wonderfully valuable and at the same time entirely harmless remedy. Indeed, I see that Dr. Gunn, dean of the United States Medical College of New York, indorses it in the highest terms."

"So you experience little difficulty in the execution of your duties now, Mr. Curtin, do you?"

"None whatever. Our department was never in better condition than at present."

"And so you never have any fear of some of the desperadoes whom you have been the means of bringing to justice?"

"Not in the least. Such men do not try to retaliate, partially because they have not the courage, but oftener because they respect an officer who does his duty."

The policemen, firemen, letter carriers and other public employes in this country have a particular trying life. When, therefore, a simple and pure remedy that can restore and sustain the health of all such men is found, it should be cause for great congratulation, especially when recommended by such a man as Superintendent Thomas Curtin of Buffalo.

Action of Waves on Marine Masonry.

The power of sea waves in breaking up heavy masses of masonry has been remarkably attested in the case of the breakwaters at Wick, on the coast of England. The height of the wave at this place was several times measured or estimated, the result being about forty-two feet from crest to hollow, and stones of eight and ten tons weight were by such waves carried from the parapet to the top of the breakwaters. This led to the construction of the outward extremity of the breakwater by depositing three courses of one-hundred-ton blocks of stone on the rubble base as a foundation for three courses of large flat stones, surmounted by a monolith of cemented rubble built on the spot; the end of the breakwaters was thus, in substance, a monolith weighing upward of eight hundred tons, being about twenty-six by forty-five feet and eleven feet in thickness, cemented to the rubble mass below. But even this huge monolithic structure succumbed to the force of the waves, being slewed around by successive strokes, until it was finally removed and deposited—a body nearly fourteen hundred tons—inside of the pier, without breaking.

A Willimantic factory girl wrote her name and address, and her desire to be married, in a nice little note, which she placed in the band of the hat she had just finished. Her father bought the hat. On his way home that evening he paused at a house which they were plastering and obtained a slender and supple lath. As the novelists say, "We will draw a veil over the scene which ensued."

THROUGH FIRE AND SMOKE.

From a Portland (Oregon) Letter.

Through Idaho and down the mighty Columbia is a journey worth a pilgrimage around the world. We have seen its wonders, but ran a guantlet of fire at its portal, where, in an hour, nature's labor of a hundred years was being swallowed up in smoke and roaring flames. All day yesterday the air was blue with smoke. The mountains looked dim, or drew their jagged peaks clear out of sight. For a day or two it had been hasy toward the west, and we had heard stories of the forest fires. Yesterday, however, the smoke grew thicker and rolled upon the westerly winds in dense clouds. Last night we had a glimpse of the Inferno. We had left Montana to cross Idaho, when about 9 o'clock the train came to a stop without a moment's warning in the midst of a wilderness. We hastened to the platform and looked forward. There was spread out a panorama such as seldom greets the eye of man. The forest was one mass of seething flame. The engine panted a time or two, and then, gathering courage, crept nearer. A few hundred yards, and it again came to a standstill. It was impossible to pass. The heat made the paint on the cars crack. The glass of the windows grew feverish under the heated breath from the fire. There was, amid all the glare, the roar of an approaching tornado, crackling and popping like a giant's whip. This was accompanied by a hissing like the sound of frying salt, as the green foliage of the living pines was consumed with a white flash. This roaring and crackling and snapping, terrible as it was, only set off the grand accompaniment of falling trees. Every five seconds a giant, with the strength of a score of centuries, measured his 200 feet across the fiery bed to which he had been felled. He stood still, scared to the core, and his hoary top was crowned with fire. As he yielded the mountain rolled back the booming of cannon from one height to the other. We hold our breath and gaze at the sky, overcast with leaden smoke, tinted here and there with a rosy hue. The crashing of the falling giant is still for a moment. The fire breaks through the gloom of the forest in a new place. The flames go racing like demons up tall trees and quiver in their top like ruddy lanterns for a moment. The foliage melts away with the first hot breath, and then the crashing and booming goes on again. For the moment the rush and crackle is drowned, and the very crags of the mountain side seem to be rolling upon us from their seats above our heads. We ask the conductor when we can go on. He says two hours. Long piles of wood stored all about the track have caught fire, and scores of Chinamen, with long poles in their hands, are hurrying up from the nearest station to save the track from ruin. Two hours pass, and still the infernal pendemonium of hissing, roaring, cracking, booming, crashing devastation goes on. The conductor and engineer are afraid to go on. They fear the heat will fire our train. Should it yield to the first spark it would melt away like tinder in a furnace. For over four hours we watched the scourge till it drew away from us and let us go.

STORIES OF THE WAR.

A Weighty Haversack Which an Old Captain Carried on the March.

From the Albany Press.

Early in the war every soldier had a passion for relics. This was carried to extremes; every man was collecting mementoes for his father, brother and sisters and special friends. The first stage demanded canon balls, pieces of shell stained with blood, cartridges taken from rebel cartridge-boxes, shot guns, squirrel rifles taken from the bushwackers, swords, and much-talked of toothpicks, but this frenzy finally exhausted itself, and the relic passion found expression in rings and ornaments from cannel coal and mussel-shells and pipes made from mountain laurel. At the time of the capture of Fort Donelson everybody was in the first stage. The officers and men first to enter the rebel lines selected artillery sabres as the best mementoes. Then they threw these away and took shot-guns with the thought that they had been in action and would be of use at home. Then, after a day or two, they threw away shot-guns and retained the smallest bits of exploded shells. One old captain from northern Ohio had a worse attack than the ordinary man was afflicted with. He put in day after day collecting guns, swords, cannon balls, and all sorts of things from the battlefield. When the orders came to move the captain was in a quandary. He solved the problem by swearing at the government for not providing adequate transportation. He retained only a large artillery sack handsomely made of leather, which he proposed to use as a haversack. He laid in a supply of chicken, butter in a teacup, biscuit, crackers, a bottle of pickles, ground coffee for extreme cases, pepper and salt for fresh meat, and arranged all in order in his roomy haversack. He was proud of the institution, and examined it frequently, each inspection making him the better satisfied with the whole arrangement. While the haversack was hanging on the gun stacks just previous to the start, some fellow picked a six-pound cannon ball from the captain's rejected collection of relics and dropped it in among the chicken, butter and biscuit. The march commenced. The captain lost faith in his haversack. He changed the strap from the right shoulder to the left and back again, and finally supported it with his hand. When the hault for dinner came he was as glad as any private weighed down with a knapsack. He retired to a proper distance and selected a seat with great deliberation on a log, opened his haversack with puckering lips. His buttercup was broken and chicken and bread and pickles were one conglomerate mass. The captain was astonded. His first reach into the mass detected the cannon ball. He drew it out, hurled it against a tree, and swore so as to fix the standard for the regiment for the war. He was outraged. After he had finished his dinner he thought better of the cannon ball venture, and declaring that as he had carried it so far he would carry it farther. And he did, and it is now displayed as a memento of the war at Defiance, Ohio. This ended the relic gathering of the company.

The provost marshals during the war brought to the surface many rich stories and these stories were enjoyed immensely by the soldiers in the field. In Southern Ohio lived good Mrs. Blank, a woman whose husband had left her years before, writing to her from New York that if he was not at home within three days she could consider that she was dead. If alive he would certainly be at home in three days. He did not come, and without understanding the mysterious allusions his wife and all his friends considered him dead. He was never heard of afterward. The widow had two sons, one a stalwart young man, the other a cripple When the first enrollment for the draft was ordered a widow was allowed to exempt one son from the draft and to select which son. She elected to have the healthy son remain at home, knowing that the cripple or invalid could not be drafted. This gave her both of her son's at home. Every one foresaw that she would do this, and the provost marshal met her with: "Before you can claim this exemption, Mrs. B., you must present satisfactory evidence that your husband is dead." Said the astonished woman: "Of course he's dead, and I can prove it: I have a letter from him in his own handwriting saying so." And to the very last the woman could not understand why this repeated declaration should cause a laugh.

In another case a backwoodsman wrote to the same officer, about as follows: "I think I ought to be exempt from draft because I have at home a child that has been sick for two years. The little thing has 'a spine in the back' and has it very bad, and it takes all I can make to keep it comfortable. If I went to war the child would suffer, and I hope you will excuse me." This letter is yet on file, and the man evidently thought he had written a terribly impressive letter.

Jilted Japanese Damsels.

The curious hold superstition has on the mind of the Japanese is very well illustrated by the proceedings taken by a Japanese damsel when her lover proves false to his vows. When the world is at rest, at two o'clock in the morning, the girl rises. She dons a white robe and high sandals or clogs. Her coif is metal tripod, in which are thrust three candles; around her neck she hangs a mirror, which falls upon her bosom; in her left hand she carries a small straw figure—the effigy of her faithless lover—and in her right she grasps a hammer and nails, with which she fastens the figure to one of the sacred trees that surround the shrine. Then she prays for the death of the traitor vowing that if her position be heard, she will herself pull out the nails which now offend the god by wounding the mystic tree Night after night she comes to the shrine, and each night she strikes in two more nails, actually believing every nail will shorten her lover's life, for she god to save this tree, will surely strike him dead.

A New Machine for Making Needles.

The manufacture of needles has recently been greatly expedited, as well as perfected, by means of a machine which takes a piece of wire less than an inch in length, and holds it firmly while it is being hammered out into a full length needle of some two inches; then, as each needle is finished, it is thrown into a receptacle near by, the operation being repeated with amazing celerity and undeviating accuracy. There is in addition, an automatic arrangement which renders it possible to so adjust the feeding apparatus that, when it requires attention, a call bell is struck, in ample time to prevent the apparatus being thrown out of working movement. After going through this process, the blanks are ready for finishing according to the usual processes.

A young lady who visited Saratoga this summer has had seven marriage proposals from young men of sense and wealth since her return home. She appeared at the hotel dinner table one day in a dress costing not over 10 cents a yard.—Norristown Herald.

WOMAN'S PATRIOTISM.

A Brave Revolutionary Deed Bravely Emulated—How a Lady Earned Her Title to Her Country's Gratitude.

Philadelphia Enquirer.

One of the first acts of the government during the approaching session of congress should be to make for the widow of the late Elias Reed, formerly of the Twelfth Pennsylvania Cavalry, a provision worthy of the lady's claims upon her country and the dignity of the Republic. While the country exists the story of Lydia Darrah making her way out of town to the Continental outposts to warn the army of an intended attack will be remembered, and though it perhaps involved more personal hardship, it was certainly no finer, and in its results of far less importance than the heroic sacrifice of feeling which this lady patriot offered on the altar of her country. Philadelphia has had the honor in this generation of being the home of two persons who were deeply concerned with momentuous issues at a time when the fate of the Republic trembled in the balance.

It was Admiral Marsden, so long a resident of West Philadelphia, who saved the Union fleet and the harbors of New York and Philadelphia, by putting aside his orders and running the risk of being cashiered by sending the monitor to assault and, as it proved, to batter the Merrimac. Mrs. Susan K. Reed by her promptness in unmasking a female spy and blockade runner, threw into the hands of the Federal generals the letters which led Meade and Hancock to move forth to meet Lee on the field of Gettysburg, when having, as he supposed only the Philadelphia militia in front of him, he expected to winter, like Howe, in the city of Brotherly Love.

With Admiral Marsden in the last war, and Lydia Darrah in the revolution, Mrs. Reed is entitled to rank in the regard of her fellow citizens and it will be a disgrace to the republic if congress shall restrict its acknowledgement of her services to the niggardly pension to which, both as the widow of a brave soldier, who died of his wounds, and as a recognition of her own services the lady now has a legal claim; a claim, too, which she never pressed while her own means sufficed, and which the pension bureau has, it is said, been dilatory about recognizing.

Mrs. Reed's maiden name was Susan K. Derringer. She was educated at the Moravian school at Bethlehem, Pa., and married early in life to Mr. Elias Reed, grandson of a brother of General Reed, of Revolutionary fame, and consequently a near relative of Hon. William B. Reed, in his prime, as the reader need scarcely be reminded, one of the leading lights of the Pennsylvania bar. For a time all prospered with the new household, and when eventually the clouds of adversity darkened over her home, Mrs. Reed met her altered fortunes with a courage and energy of which only natures finely attuned to fine issues are capable.

When her husband returned wounded from the war the lady, by her activity and resolution, maintained for him, herself and their children the home which his failing strength no longer enabled him to support. At that period her well-appointed house on Sansom street, near Eighth, was the home of many persons of distinction. Leading lawyers, naval and military officers of note, and, many of the dramatic stars of that day, Joseph Jefferson among them, enjoyed the hospitalities of her handsome rooms and the luxuries of her bountifully furnished table. Her sons inherited many of their mother's finest traits of character, and among them the declining days of the patriot father, who really, though mercifully spared at first the knowledge of the truth, had come home to die were made as comfortable and as free from care as it was possible to render them.

Strange to say, his wounds at first did not appear serious, yet his system never rallied from the shock, and although a physician's certificate attributed to the death of Mr. Reed, on New Year's day, 1874, to "natural causes," it was a fact susceptible of proof that he fell a victim to his loyalty and died a martyr in his country's cause. After his decease Mrs. Reed took upon herself in part the management of a store kept by one of her sons on Ninth street, above Arch, and for sixteen years conducted the business successfully, as indeed she might still be doing, since time does not seem to have impaired her activity, but for the effects of the competition of larger enterprises and greater capital, which gradually drew away from her store, as from so many others, the business that year of industry had built up.

These circumstances are mentioned to show that it is time that the lady's eminent service to the nation should receive national acknowledgement. The history of that service is briefly as follows: Lee had determined upon his last desperate attempt to defend the south by carrying war and desolation to the firesides of the north. Strangely enough one of the first persons to receive a hint of the intended movement was Mrs. Reed. Her house, on Samson street, was then in the full tide of success, and among those who had made their homes there before the war was a young medical student, belonging to a southern family of great wealth. By some means, which it is not now necessary to particularize, a letter from that gentleman found its way to Mrs. Reed, who, after glancing over its contents, said to her husband, "Mr. B——writes to ask me to let him have his old room when he arrives in Philadelphia. He is an officer in Lee's army. I am sure some movement is on foot having this city for its objective point."

The suspicions thus aroused were singularly confirmed a few days later. There came to Mrs. Reed's a transient boarder, an old friend, who seemed to have plenty of means, but whose goings and comings had for some time been mysterious. One day after dinner this lady told Mrs. Reed that she was foolish to waste her time taking in boarders when she might make so much more money another way. In reply to a request for an explanation of the riddle, this lady displayed a cloak, the lining of which was largely composed of quinine, remarking that it was worth thousands of dollars; and then, from some mysterious crypt in her bonnet, drew forth five letters for which she said she would receive from $100 to $300 apiece, adding that she made her way from the South by running blockade.

The friend who had thus revealed herself in her true colors as the enemy of Mrs. Reed's country was to leave the city on a midnight train. Duty pointed straight to the office of the Provost Marshal, and tither, overcoming her natural reluctance to such a course, the patriotic hostess repaired in ample time, as it happily proved to prevent mischief.

"If she had carried only quinine," Mrs Reed afterwards remarked to a friend, "she might have gone on her way unmolested, for I pitied the poor sick people of the South, when quinine was worth its weight in gold; but I reasoned that letters on which the postage was so high must be of national importance."

Fortunately the fair traitress had given Mrs. Reed her photograph. With the portrait to guide them the military authorities were not long in taking action. The woman was arrested, and quinine and letters were soon in the possession of the war department. From those letters the government derived some of its most important information relative to that movement of General Lee in which he was so unexpectedly checkmated by finding the army of the Potomac in his front.

Mr. Reed for some time before his death drew his pension, which he succeeded in obtaining, be it noted, with the difficulty which seems to beset most applicants for the tender mercies of the Pension Bureau. After her husband's decease Mrs Reed, being then in easy circumstances, refrained, with characteristic unselfishness, from making any claim upon the government to which she had rendered such essential service in its time of need.

Through the advice of friends the lady's claim is now being pressed by a law firm in this city, and even if nothing more is done, there should be no difficulty about its speedy settlement under the most liberal construction existing statutess.

Spoopendyke's Sail-Boat.

"My dear!" exclaimed Mr. Spoopendyke, bouncing into his wife's room and interrupting the lady in the purely feminine enjoyment of unpacking for the summer. "My dear, there's no use trying to get along in the country without a sail-boat, and I have bought a nice one. Come along and I'll show you how it works."

"Ain't that nice!" giggled Mrs. Spoopendyke, who stood in mortal terror of the water and was afraid of anything in the shape of a boat. Are you going to sail it on the pond?"

"At first I thought I'd sail it down the cellar," growled Mr. Spoopendyke, "but the landlord was afraid it might upset the milk; then I thought I'd try the garret, but there's too much wind up there, so I believe I'll stick to the river. Hurry up now, and I'll show you the biggest boat in thirteen counties!"

"If it's as big as that it must have cost a good deal," murmured Mrs. Spoopendyke, somewhat reassured by the size of the boat. "I am very glad you got a large boat, though, of course, the expense—"

"What d'ye think I've been buying?" demanded Mr. Spoopendyke, with a flushed face; "got some kind of a notion that I've invested my wealth in a salt marsh, with telegraph poles for masts, haven't ye? Think I've been laying out money in a town site, don't ye? Well, I haven't, and I haven't been buying a rural district with a rudder to it. It's a boat, I tell ye—a sail-boat—and it won't come up here to make a formal call; so if you are going to it, you want to go where it is. Coming?" and Mr. Spoopendyke pegged off with his hat pulled down over his ear and the expression of a veteran tar on his visage.

"Yes, dear," replied Mrs. Spoopendyke, fluttering after him. "Say, dear, I'll stand on the shore and watch you sail the thing."

"You won't do any thing of the kind," retorted Mr. Spoopendyke. "I bought that boat for your pleasure as much as mine, and you're going to sail in it. When I want you to stand on the shore and watch anything, I'll hire a man to drown himself. Now, look at that boat! Isn't she a daisy? See how she sets on the water!"

"What are all these clothes lines hanging down from that stick for?" asked Mrs Spoopendyke, surveying the yacht critically.

"To play Copenhagen with," roared Mr. Spoopendyke, who was not at all anxious to be examined on the technical points of his new acquisition. "You take hold of those ropes, and slap your hands, and then we kiss. See into it now? Does the art of navigation begin to appear to your understanding? Now you get in, and I'll make sail" and Mr. Spoopendyke handed his wife into the cockpit and began to tug away at his halyards.

"Why didn't you have a sail made when the boat was built?" inquired Mrs. Spoopendyke, by way of encouraging her husband's labors with pleasant conversation.

"Because the man was sick," snarled Mr. Spoopendyke, glancing at the head of the mast to see what was wrong. "Come up here, will ye?" he grunted as he grabbed the halyards again. "There, dod gast ye! I knew I'd fetch ye!" and he walked aft to examine the trim of the mainsail. "How does that set?"

"It seems to be a little full in the back breadth," said Mrs. Spoopendyke, holding on to the coaming with both hands. "If you cut a gore near that top stick it would be straighter."

"I suppose so," muttered Mr. Spoopendyke, giving another haul at his peak halyards. "If I put a bustle on it I imagine it would take the wrinkles out. Now, I'll get on that jib, and mind, don't you touch anything."

Mr. Spoopendyke set his jib and pushed off. As his sail filled, the boat heeled over, to the manifest consternation of Mrs. Spoopendyke.

"What makes the thing tip so?" she asked, scrambling up to windward and grasping Mr. Spoopendyke by the collar.

"Let down the centreboard!" yelled Mr Spoopendyke, suddenly remembering the instructions he had received when he bought the boat. "Let go that centerboard, quick!"

"I haven't got it," squealed Mrs. Spoopendyke. "I haven't seen it! We must have left it ashore! Oh, my!" The last exclamation was addressed to a half-hundred weight of water sloping over the coaming.

"Haul away on that jib sheet!" roared Mr. Spoopendyke, who found it was going ashore on the other bank of the river. "Pull her in as quick as you can! Let go of the he!" continued, as he saw his wife clutching convulsively at the peak haylard cleat. "Let go that measly thing, will ye, and haul the jib sheet."

"Is this it?" gasped Mrs. Spoopendyke casting the throat halyard loose; "or this?" and she let go the peak halyard, dropping the boom on Mr. Spoopendyke's head and burying him under the mainsail. "Perhaps this is what he means," she soliloquized, as she hit upon the jib halyard, and let it go by the run. "Now we are sailing better, dear, If it hadn't been for me we would have tipped over."

"That's it!" yelled Mr. Spoopendyke, struggling out from under the canvas. "That's navigation!" You struck it from the shoulder, first clip! All you want now is a quid of tobbacco and a hitch to your breeches to be a Cunard steamer! Got through! Anything else you can do to this measly boat? If you had a compass in your ear and a deck load of idiots, you'd only need a custom house inspector and a Hell Gate pilot to be a floating lunatic asylum!" and Mr. Spoopendyke hailed a passing row-boat and was tugged ashore ignominiously.

"I don't care," muttered Mrs. Spoopendyke, as she scrambled up the dock and followed her lord to the hotel. "I don't care. I may not know as much about a boat as he does, but if it hadn't been for me he would have been drowned like the dogs in August. Another time we go sailing, we'll bring the boat to our room, and wrap the jib sheet around us, unless it is to hot, and, in that case, we'll sell the boat and buy fans."

And Mrs. Spoopendyke toiled up the the steps of the porch to tell the ladies what a delightful sail she had enjoyed and how much Mr. Spoopendyke knew about managing his new ship.

DEVIL'S DAUGHTER.

A Spectral Rider Rides a Shadowy Mare.

At Baden-Baden a horse-race was to take place; a great many spectators had assembled. The elite had not yet arrived, and as therefore the races had not yet begun, the sportsmen were standing in groups. Among these were two officers of the army.

"Do you really intend to let Devil's Daughter take part, Poseneck?" asked one of them.

"Undoubtedly; she has the best chances."

"But who will you get to ride the mare?"

"I shall find some one; and if not, I shall ride her myself."

"If your Cousin Arno would ride her, there might be a chance of winning; but as he is engaged to be married, his affianced probably will not allow it; and she can not be blamed for doing so, for on that horse one risks breaking his neck."

The steeple-chase rider spoken of, Arno von Hohenstein, was present, and therefore Kurt von Poseneck hoped to gain his aid, for he knew how passionately fond his cousin was of this sport.

He found him, accompanied by his intended and future father-in-law.

"I suppose it grieves you not to take part to day," said Poseneck, and, turning to the young lady, he added: "You may be flattered that he intends to give it up for your sake."

"I suppose we now will try to get seats, for soon all will be taken," said Arno, with a sigh.

While he led the way, Poseneck whispered to the young lady: "Have you not one word of comfort for me, Victorine?" Unseen by the others, she slipped a little note into Kurt's hand. He escaped as soon as possible to read it undisturbed.

It contained the following words: "Forgive me; I was forced to comply with the wish of my parents. My entreaties, tears, remonstrances, were in vain, therefore I am the affianced of Arno von Hohenstein. I am lost to you forever, but I shall never forget you"

Poseneck's glance rested upon the woman he loved, the affianced of another. There she stood, a stately figure, with a clear dark complexion and lustrous black eyes, beside the insignificant-looking blonde, her future husband. At that moment Poseneck vowed that it should not be.

Shortly before the steeple-chase began he appeared in the Paddock, accompanied by Arno. Notwithstanding the opposition of Victorine's father, he had succeeded in persuading him to ride the mare. Victorine had greatly influenced his decision, for when Poseneck whispered to her to assist him, she without hesitation did so.

It was a beautiful sight when the eleven horsemen who were to take part in the races took their positions. Devil's Daughter, a powerful, dark brown, thoroughbred mare, under Hohenstein's guidance attracted all attention. The more restless she was the more composed and immovable sat her rider. As Victorne heard the admiring exclamations, she felt for the first time a certain interest in her future husband.

She was roused from her thoughts by Poseneck's voice, saying rather ironically:

"You are looking at your intended with great interest," and as she looked up, he continued, lowering his voice: "You shall be mine," and to himself he murmured: "This decides his fate."

Victorine cast a frightful glance at the tall, commanding figure of Poseneck, as he slowly moved on. What could he mean? Death and destruction to the unfortunate Hohenstein? She knew that two years before Poseneck had killed in a duel the count Pruckwitz, a suitor of hers, who was favored by her relatives. When he returned from the fortress, where he had been confined for several months, he found her still true to him. But her passionate love was now mingled with admiring awe. His demoniacal and authoritative manner, instead of repelling her, attracted her and ruled her entirely.

Kurt von Poseneck combined an imposing and distinguished appearance with the most agreeable social qualities. He also had won the reputation of being reckless and daring on the battlefield. All this made him a general favorite with the ladies.

He had easily won Victorine's love. But her parents wished another husband for their daughter; for they thought the dashing young officer was not the man to make her happy. So Poseneck's offer was declined. But being assured of Victorine's affection, he did not give up his hopes. He succeeded in keeping up a secret correspondence with her, which was only discontinued when Victorine, forced by her parents, was betrothed to Arno von Hohenstein. Poseneck's rage and grief at this were great in the extreme; but with the self command peculiar to him, he controlled his feelings.

Under these circumstances, Victorine also suffered inexpressible anguish. The affianced of one whom she did not love, cherishing love for another, wavering between duty and affection, carried away by her passion—she wrote that note which she had given Poseneck.

The race began, and all but Hohenstein dashed on; he purposely kept back only to give the mare the rein afterward. First they went over the water-jump. Then came a stone wall, one of the most dangerous obstacles. At this place Poseneck had taken position to await Devil's Daughter. The mare came on. Arno was already prepared for the leap, when Poseneck uttered a peculiar, hoarse cry. The noble animal, startled, stopped, and the rider was thrown forward, his head striking against the wall.

The next moment Poseneck knelt beside a corpse. As saw the fixed, glassy look of the dead man's eye, he shivered with horror. The violence of his passion for Victorine had led him to commit a deed which resembled a cowardly assassination. That moment was impressed on his memory, never to be forgotten.

The accident had been seen from the stand, and spectators hurriedly approached. Poseneck went to break the news to Victorine and her father. But he only said that he was seriously hurt: that he was dead he did not dare to tell them.

"The poor, dear boy!" exclaimed the old gentleman. "When I saw him thrown, I immediately thought something serious had happened. I must see him. Count von Poseneck, please conduct my daughter to her carriage."

He hurried away and left the two alone. With indescribable anguish, Victorine read the terrible truth in his pale face.

"He is dead," she gasped, and as his looks affirmed it, he continued: "I am to blame—I persuaded him to take part."

"It was I that caused death. I did it out of love for you. I have not only loved you more than my life, but more than my honor, my conscience! The price paid to win you was fearful; but mine you shall be."

Did Victorine surmise the truth? She seemed as if petrified; she dared not think. Her love outweighed her loathing.

"You dare not reject me," he continued, passionately. "You are mine, soul and body. I would be driven to despair if I did not possess your love—the only ray of light in the darkness that surrounds me."

Who could describe Victorine's feelings? Could she overcome her horror, or did this terrible proof of his passion kindle her love?

* * * * * * *

Two years have passed since Arno von Hohenstein has been numbered with the dead. Few remembered him. His parents he had lost when a boy. The comrades with whom he had been a favorite, his former friends, his cousins who inherited his estates, thought of him no more. So no one seemed to be astonished when Victorine was betrothed and married to Poseneck, whose financial circumstances had been bettered by an unexpected inheritance.

Time had not taught Victorine to forget Hohenstein's tragical death. Often he seemed to appear before her, menacing and threatening, and at night she often started from her sleep with shriek. But when Poseneck was at her side, her happiness was so great as to obliterate the dark past.

That day, the second anniversary of Arno's death, races were again to be held at Baden-Baden. Kurt's father-in-law had asked him to attend. He acquiesced rather unwillingly. His thoughts turned continually to the moment when he had knelt beside Hohenstein's corpse. Even the presence of his beloved wife could not make him forget. He had to summon all his strength to maintain his outward composure. But Victorine's loving eyes read his inmost thoughts.

He was restless; he passed from group to group, and at last went in the paddock, to take a look at the horses. One of his comrades stepped up to him and said:

"Poseneck, you must ride Crevecœur to-day."

"Don't you know that I have given up steeple-chase riding altogether?"

After a great deal of coaxing and bantering, he at last consented.

"Seems a fever has seized me," he muttered to himself, for, in spite of the warm weather he felt chilly.

As the moment of action arrived, knowing that he needed all his nerve, he regained his self-command. Just as he was putting his foot in the stirrup, he heard some one say:

"Have you heard that at Hamburg, day before yesterday, Devil's Daughter broke her neck?"

He felt as if he had received a blow. The horse that had been his tool was dead. She had passed from one to another, having brought nothing but misfortune to her owner's. Another in his position, perhaps, would have silenced his conscience by saying that it had been the horse's fault. Poseneck could not do so. Only too well he knew that he had deliberately caused Hohenstein's death. He did not repent the deed, but still he was often haunted by his victim.

As the race was proceeding it was easily seen what Creve cœur could do. He was gaining ground constantly, and each obstacle was cleared without effort. Soon he was in front. Suddenly Poseneck saw a shadow, without hearing the tread of a horse. He turned and saw beside him Arno von Hostein, mounted on Devil's Daughter.

Was the terrible apparition a creation of his excited imagination?

"Who is the rider next to Kurt?" Victorine asked her father.

"A rider? I see none! Poseneck is leading the race."

"There, on the dark horse. I see him plainly. Merciful God! it is Hohenstein."

Her father turned hastily toward her—she had fainted.

In the meantime the two riders sped away.

Poseneck could not avert his eyes from that ghastly face that was close beside him. Now the horses neared the stone wall, and he prepared involuntarily for the leap.

Suddenly the phantom turned and fixed its glassy look full upon his face.

With an inarticulate cry, he let go the reins, and covered his face with his hands. Creve-cœur, suddenly deprived of his master's guidance, fell, throwing his rider.

His comrades, rushing toward the spot, found Poseneck a corpse. No one but he and Victorine, the only one who knew of the foul deed, had seen the spectral rider.—Translated for the Argonaut from the German by Lois.

The bootblacks in Chicago have organized. One of them stated the fact thus to a News reporter: "You newspaper 'porters ain't no good, dat's what's de matter—yer ain't enterprisin' like as wot I'd be," cried one of the numerous bootblackers of Chicago to-day. "Now, we's organized a union, and you haven't 'ported a word 'bout it; de prices has gone up, or been fluctuating, as dey say on the board, and we now charges 10 cents a shine, but it didn't come out in de papers like the frost Yer see, ole man Harrison fixed it up fer us, an' we'l be hunki-dori in a few days. Wat'll we do et any of the profesh go back? Why, trow 'em in de lake, dat's wot we'll do, an' don't you forget it!"

Edible Bird's Nest's.

One of the chief experts of North Borneo, according to a recent letter to the London Standard, is that rare delicacy so highly esteemed by the people of the Flowery Kingdom, the luscious and appetizing bird's nests. They are a tolerably unvarying source of revenue and the caves, if properly worked, are practically inexhaustible. One cave alone, Gomanton, produces as much as $20,000 per annum, while those at Bodmadai, in Darve Bay, are reported to be nearly as valuable, though, owing to the claims of the natives upon them and for other reasons they do not produce anything like that sum. Besides these there are eight or ten others, which are for the most part either indifferently worked or as yet unexplored.

The nests are divided, according to their color and purity, into three qualities—putih, manas, and etain (white, brown and black), which, at a low estimate, are severally worth about $1,100, $200, and $90 per picul of 133 pounds. For the half-year ending June, 1882, the duties on birds' nests exported from Elopura at 5 per cent. amounted to the sum of $1,107. From January 1, 1883, the duty has been raised to 10 per cent

Typhoid Diseases.

Dr. George Hamilton, in the Medical Record takes issue with those who assume the conveyance of germs of typhoid and scarlet fever, diptheria and dysentery by contaminated drinking water, and who do not believe that sewer gas can spread the infection or originate the diseases. Referring to the epidemics that sometimes occur suddenly in cities fed with drinking water from some common source he says that their sudden appearance and as sudden disappearance cannot be attributed to the character of the water except on the supposition that the water changes suddenly from purity to impurity, and vice versa a supposition incompatible with the delivery supply of water from reservoirs. Walled up cess-pools, he says, are common in the city and not usually found in the country, and the exhalations from unventilated and uncared for vaults have much to do with the prevalence of typhoid diseases.

FARM AND HOUSE.

Recipes for the Housewife.

Cream Trout.—Cut on the head and tail, and put in boiling water slightly salted; let it simmer five minutes, when taking it out, let it drain, and put in a stewpan with some powdered mace, nutmeg and cayenne pepper; cover with cream and the fresh-grated rind of a lemon; keep the pan covered and stew ten minutes; after dishing it stir in the cream a teaspoonful of arrowroot and pour over the trout.

A Nice Desert.—Put a layer of sugar in a quart bowl, then a layer of tart apples, then of sugar, then of apples, till the bowl is full; then a half teacup of water; set in the oven with a slow fire for two or three hours, with a cover on the bowl. Set away to cool, turn out on a plate, and you have a layer of jelly and a layer of apples.

Apple Jelly.—Take nice-flavored, tart, juicy apples, pare or not, core, cut in thin slices, place in kettle, pour in water to just cover, and boil gently without stirring until tender; strain carefully without squeezing, in small quantity at a time, and proceed exactly as in peach jelly; the same amount of sugar.

Peach Coddler.—Pare the peaches carefully, but do not take out the stones; put them into a deep dish and sweeten well; cover with a thick crust of rich pastry, and close the edges well to prevent the escape of the syrup. Serve hot with cream.

Steel knives which are not in daily use may be kept from rusting if they are dipped in a strong solution of soda—one part of water to four of soda; then wipe dry, roll in flannel, and keep in a dry place.

Among other pretty ways to finish the edge of a silk lounge quilt are these: but a border of narrow ribbon on in strips, make a point on the end of each piece of ribbon, and under these allowing it to show a trifle; below them put a ruffle of lace. The other way is to omit the lace and put a tassel or small ball on each point.

If a teaspoonful of turpentine is put in the wash-boiler and boiled with the clothes, it will whiten them perceptibly.

A somewhat novel way to trim a table-scarf is to put three-cornered pieces of silk or satin on each end. Have these pieces half a yard deep at the longest side, in the corner embroider a spray of flowers; where the satin or silk end joins the center part of the scarf put a row of fancy stitches. A dark crimson felt scarf with one end light blue, the other of crimson shaded to brown is very handsome.

Never buy lard ready made if you can help it, but take hog's fat, the part enveloping the kidneys, or leaf lard, and chop it fine; put it in a cast-iron or crockery kettle, with a bay leaf and a stalk of thyme to every two pounds of fat; set it on a moderate fire, and as soon as it begins to melt take the melted part out with a ladle and put it in a stone jar or pot; do not take any pieces of fat not yet melted. Continue the process until it is all melted. The dry or hard part that remains at the bottom of the kettle when done is no good, Lard made in this way is as white as snow, and may be kept an indefinite time.

Fashionable Chat.

Carved wood ornaments are being revived.

Straw is the preferred material for hats and bonnets this month.

A fashionable evening dress is that made of ecru lace and worn over a surah of the same shade.

Gants de suede, or unglazed kid gloves are worn for both day and evening dress; they come in dark, medium and light shades.

Young girls can wear belts even with basque bodices; they are stylish, fastened at the side with cockade bow, or a metal or pearl buckle.

The Brighton is the name of a new short jacket, designed for young women who ape the English craze of cutting the hair short and wearing a jockey cap.

An elegant traveling suit for a bride is of gray cashmere, trimmed with several rows of fine silver braid, sewn on flat and close to each other. This braid borders the skirt, basque, sleeves and collar, gray straw hat, with a long silvery shaded feather and a gray gauze veil.

Stockings are in bright colors, many of them having a design in imitation of ribs worked down the legs in raised silk. A novelty in infants' shoes consists in the finish of the knitted woolen sock with silk braid, chain-stitch, in color or tiny silk lacings. Some of them have rows of very small buttons forming a design across the instep.

Velveteen is in great favor this season for underskirts, which are simple in construction, with only a plaited ruche, lined with surah or satin around the bottom. The Arcadia velveteens appear this season in such perfection that they can hardly be distinguished from real velvet; indeed, they are quite as handsome as velvet, both for skirts and complete costumes or for wraps and jackets.

Tailor-made suits are all the rage The most popular materials for them are tricois, lady cloth, and cheviots. It is impossible to have them too plainly made; usually they are entirely untrimmed and have rows of double stitching around the basque, collar and cuffs, the skirt being also very closely stitched or draped in the most severely classical style. Dark hunting green, greys and deep blues are the fashionable colors. One of the handsomest imported suits in the city is in fine lady cloth, stitched in a palm-leaf design, in the same brown color as the material, the design being carried round the drapery of the over-skirt and repeated as a bordering upon the collar and cuffs.

Farm Notes.

The fat stock show, which will open November 15, promises to be unusually attractive.

Many pastures and fields can be easily and advantageously irrigated.

Bagging tomatoes is said to improve their color.

When selecting corn, potatoes, &c., for seed, always save the best. Small products, of inferior quality, may do well for hogs, cattle, &c, but only the largest and best should be reserved for next year's planting.

A Kansas farmer thought that the patridges he saw running between the rows of corn just sprouting were pulling up the seed, and he began killing them; after one cut worm, twenty striped bugs, and over a hundred chinch-bugs were found in the crop of one bird, he concluded he had made a mistake.

The poultry breeders of Hammonton, N. J., have endeavored to settle the vexed question as to which breed of poultry is the best for general purposes. The Brahmas, Plymouth Rocks, Wyandottes, Leghorns, Langshans and Houdans were experimented with, not only for egg production but for marketing purposes. The Houdans and Wyandottes were too late in the trial, but the verdict of the majority of the breeders is in favor of the Langshans, which grow to a large size, lay very early and until late in the season, rarely sit, and stand the climate well. The chicks of that breed grow very fast, are compact and realize the highest market prices.

Soot and Ashes.

Soot and ashes have to answer for much of the smoke and dirt which we have in our homes. The spring would naturally be the time to get rid of these disagreeable commodities, but after they are neglected, and when the fall fires are built their presence creates not a little trouble. Chimneys need cleaning now and then or every gust of wind will drive a cloud of soot down into the rooms through grate or stove. Furnaces need to have the pipes taken down once a year and cleared of the accumulation of dust and dirt which collects in them Unless the smoke pipe of the furnace is clear the draft will be in a measure obstructed, and it will be hard to keep a fire without all the dampers open. Base-burners need careful attention; the lower part of the stove which is usually cleared from a small opening at the back should be kept clear of ashes or the gas which should be carried up the chimney will be forced into the room when the direct draft is closed. Cook stoves will often utterly refuse to bake, and the only reason will be because they are filled up with ashes and soot. Unless stoves are kept clear it will be found difficult to have a good draft without opening the direct damper, by doing which a great deal of heat will be lost and fuel wasted.

A Western Pickle Company.

As an evidence of what can be done to benefit intelligent farmers and add as well to the material wealth of the community, we submit the following facts from Mr. J. S. Stickney, ex-president of the Wisconsin State Horticultural society in that state, located at Milwaukee Under Mr. Stickney's supervision, the company made up the product of 300 acres of cucumbers which yielded 25,000 bushels. The heaviest amount taken from one acre being 320 bushels, the average price paid was fifty cents per bushel of fifty pounds. In addition to the above, this factory put up the product of two acres of tomatoes, which were made into catsup; two acres wax beans, four acres small silver skinned onions, one-half acre of horseradish, and thirteen tons of cauliflower. The expenses of seeds, materials, &c., brought and distributed among growers, was $15,000. The net profit on the total product cannot be given, as the manufactured goods have not been marketed. This makes a good showing for the pickle company, which we believe is still in its infancy. We learn that the managers of this company have been very liberal with the farmers who have grown crops for them, and propose to make it more profitable for them the coming season.—Rural World.

Personal Mention.

Spurgeon has only two children, twins, and both of them are Baptist clergymen.

Jules Lefebvre is to paint a large work "for an American millionaire," the subject to be Lady Godiva. The moment chosen is that in which the countess, surrounded by her maidens, is mounting her horse to set forth on her celebrated ride. One of her attendents is withdrawing from her shoulders a velvet-lined mantle, against whose rich texture the nude and lovely form stands out in full relief. The face of Godiva, "full of chaste heroism and noble resolve," is said to be exquisite, though the picture is as yet a sketch.

The late Henry L. King, of Albany, left $20,000 for a memorial fountain to be erected in that city. The executors of the estate have delayed action in the matter, and the fund now amounts to nearly $26,000. It is probable that the fountain will soon be erected, from designs and models prepared by Mr. Charles F. Heston, of Philadelphia, who constructed the Drexel fountain in Chicago.

The eager activity with which Mr. Gladstone leaped from the paddle box of the tug to the gangway of the Pembroke Castle elicted great cheering from the sailors and the crowd on shore. Tennyson, the poet laureate on the other hand, looked very feeble, and had to be assisted. He wore his usual costume, an Inverness cloak, open collar, unbuttoned waistcoat, and broad unnamed billycot hat. During the voyage he never parted with a green-colored volume which lay open on his knees.

PILGRIMAGE.

Give me my scallop-shell of quiet,
 My staffe of faith to walk upon,
My scrip of joy—immortal diet—
 My bottle of salvation.
My gown of glory, hope's true gauge;
 And thus I take my pilgrimage.

Blood must be my body's balmer,
 While my soul, like peaceful palmer,
Traveleth toward the land of Heaven,
 Other balm will not be given.

Over the silver mountains,
 Where spring the nectar fountains,
There will I kiss
 The bowl of bliss,
And drink my everlasting fill
 Upon every milken hill;
My soul will be a-dry before,
 But after that will thirst no more.

ACROSS THE ALPS TO ITALY.

EXTRACTS FROM MR. WHEELOCK'S LETTERS.

I think it was on Saturday, the 8th inst, that we left Stresa, the terminus of our carriage journey over the Simplon pass to Lake Maggiore, for Milan. Here is our itinerary since. To Arona by boat and to Milan by rail. Five days at Milan, including an excursion to the celebrated Carthusian monastery at Certosa. Thence on Thursday by rail to Como, from which we ascended Lake Como to Bellagio—beautiful spot—thence yesterday by steamer in fifteen minutes to Menaggio, on the other side of the lake; thence by carriage over a steep winding mountain road to Porlezzo, on Lake Lugano, at which point we took the steamer and made a circuit of the lake to Ponte Stresa; thence again by diligence to Luini, on Lake Maggiore again, which from that point we ascended by steamer to Locarno, the chief town of its northern extremity, with one of the best hotels, I should judge, in Switzerland. So that you will see we have, in the last few days, employed about all the forms of locomotion, except the bicycle and balloon, which we had not previously tried in our Alpine excursions, on foot and on mule-back. In this way we have had a pretty general, though, of course, hasty, view of the fine scenery of these charming Italian lakes, as we had some weeks ago of Lake Geneva. In their general natural, as well as artificial, features, these lakes are very much alike—long, narrow and winding basins, rimmed with a stately coil of hills and mountains, folded in upon each other in those endless diversities of slope and curve and angle which give such infinite variety to the play of light and shadow; and which, as they unfold with every change in the point of view at every turn around a bend or promontory, disclose a fresh surprise of charming landscape views, with fresh backgrounds of mountains and blue distances. Apropos of blues, I have not got them; but I just have been looking at them, and I have never seen, even in the farthest depths of distance, anything like the deep and tender blue of the haze which now veils the mountains on the other side of the lake, just in front of us, blending with and softening their greens and browns, and the lights and shadows playing upon them in a way that would fill a painter with despair. From the water's edge to the farthest limit of vegetation, often extending to their tops and ridges, these mountain slopes are luxuriant with the products of a laborious cultivation. The vine is carried far up their steep sides with narrow terraces, walled with stone, rising like the steps of an immense stairway. The olive and the pomegranate are among the forms of sub-tropical vegetation which alternate here with patches of corn and buckwheat and common products of the more northern fields and gardens. The villas of the rich and the humble houses of the peasantry, which dot these steep mountain sides—as well as the cities and villages which nestle at their base—all alike present the same stiff, rectangular forms of Italian domestic architecture; but all alike glowing with the warm rich tints—pink and yellow predominating—with which the Italians delight to cover their stuccoed exteriors. Their roofs of terra cotta are extremely ugly in their construction, but their rich brown colors give them a picturesque effect. It is a poor Italian house, too, which cannot boast upon this background of gayly tinted stucco a highly colored fresco of the Virgin Mary or the Descent from the Cross, or some of the other favorite subjects of Italian art in the middle ages.

The first thing which strikes one in coming from Switzerland into Italy is the contrast between the stern and rugged aspects of nature on the other side of the Alps with the soft and gladsome luxuriance of the Cisalpine landscapes, and the correlation of these purely physical contrasts with the manners and physiognomies and habitations of the people. The Swiss chalet is pleasant to see only in pictures. It is simply a rude hut, built of hewn logs, browned by the weather and time, surmounted by a broad-brimmed roof of rough slate or wood shingles, on which stones are piled to hold them in place. Perched high up on the mountain sides, on some little patch of pasture wrested from the wilderness of vertical rocks above and below it, its gloomy exterior seems in harmony with the savage and inaccessible solitude around it. Its inhabitants, whose life is a perpetual struggle with tempest and cold and avalanche for a bare existence, with the help of their mountain goats, from these barren rocks, cannot be expected to be a very cheerful people; and they are not. Even when the log hut of the mountains gives place to the stone or stuccoed dwellings of the valleys, no trace of a brightness in color or beauty of form lightens the hard and dingy grey of exteriors that seem to symbolize the hard, dull life within them. But when you have passed the Alps the sunshine of the warmer and gladder sky seems reflected in the happier faces of the people, and to be refracted in all its primary colors in their tinted stuccoes and frescoes, and in the flowers which are potted with profusion in the windows and verandas. As a rule, too, the men and women, above the class whose men and women are simply beasts of burden, are much handsomer in form and feature than the same classes north of the Alps. Perhaps something is due to race—and more, doubtless, to a more genial climate and physical conditions which have permitted a freer and healthier physical development of its people; but the Italians, at least of Northern Italy, seem to me much finer looking, on the average than the French or Germans; and so far as I have been able to observe they seem to be a happy, as they are certainly an orderly, industrious and thrifty people. One may see the Madonnas of Luini and Bourgognone, if not of Titian or Raphael, every day on the streets of Milan; and I presume a closer or more extended observation would show the types of the sweet Italian faces and graceful forms which served as models for the great masters in every Italian city and village.

The churches of all the mountain districts of Northern Italy have this peculiarity—that, as a rule, they are perched at as high and inaccessible an altitude on the sides, if not on the tops, of the mountains as they could be put. I don't know whether this was in pursuance of the old pagan custom of erecting altars to the gods in similar elevated situations. It is more probably an ingenious contrivance of the priests for imposing a penance for the sins of the faithful by making the path to church and to heaven as difficult and painful as possible. I am confirmed in this theory by the large number of pilgrimage churches, which I have seen built away up on steep mountain sides, the difficult winding ascent to which is marked by numerous shrines, at each of which the climbing pilgrim kneels and recites the prescribed prayers. These shrines are stone, or, perhaps, brick structures, plastered with white stucco, looking like a whitewashed chimney in a state of arrested development, with the oven or niche either frescoed with pictures, or occupied with images of the Virgin Mary and her Son, and her usual attendants of saints and angels, and generally with a figure of Christ upon a crucifix flanked with the usual candles. They are frequent on many of the highways; and it is not unusual to find above them, and sometimes on simple crosses, an inscription announcing that the bishop of so-and-so will grant an indulgence of forty days or more to whomsoever will, for a prescribed length of time daily, before the shrine or cross, recite such or such a prayer. I don't know as it is worth while to bother you about our visit to Milan. Its magnificent cathedral is alone worth a voyage across the ocean to see, and it possesses a number of very ancient churches—like that St. Ambrogio—which are chiefly interesting from their historical associations and as examples of the rudimentary forms of Gothic, Lombardean and Romanesque architecture. The meanness of the material—for they are built of brick—greatly detracts from whatever remains of architectural beauty modern restorations have left them. Though Milan is near the famous granite quarries of Bervena, and much nearer than Rome to the marble quarries whence its marble columns were transported, all its medieval churches are of brick except its cathedral, which is of white marble from sub-base to its highest pinnacle. I will not attempt to describe so familiar an edifice, least of all to criticise a work on which has been lavished the patient art of the best architects and sculptors of Italy for hundreds of years. Its interior is indescribably grand. Its exterior is as indescribably rich in statues and sculptured ornamentation, especially in statues and their accessories, which are so lavishly employed that it seems to swarm with petrified apostles and saints and giants, and what not. Still richer in sculptured reliefs is the splendid facade of the celebrated Carthusian monastery at Certosa, fifteen miles from Milan, built under the auspices of the same Visconti who, in 1386, founded the Milan cathedral. Many famous pictures, on canvas and wood and in fresco, adorn the walls of the old churches of Milan, and it has a very valuable collection in the picture gallery of the Brera—among others, Raphael's Sposalizio. But its most precious art treasure is the famous Last Supper of Leonardo da Vinci, painted on the walls of what was once the refectory of a monastery, now a cavalry barrack; and, though in a dilapidated condition, it is still a masterpiece which transcends all the efforts of the most skillful copyists. It has been many thousand times copied. It has never been reproduced.

For an Italian city, Milan is wonderfully clean. While cherishing its antiquities, it is also a thriving commercial and manufacturing city, full of the bustling spirit of modern progress. The general architecture of business buildings is modern, and some of them are splendid. Perhaps no city in the world contains so magnificent a commercial arcade as its Galleria Vittoria Emanuele. It has all the apparatus of a great modern commercial city—railways, canals, street railways, motor railways, and even the electric light. A merciful Providence has thus far preserved it from the telephone. If this, my last sheet of paper, had not given out, I was going to tell you how much the fruitful plains of Lombardy resembled Illinois in their monotonous flatness, and even in some of their characteristic productions.

ARIADNE AT NAXOS.

Nay, traitor doubts that mar my life's repose,
I will not heed your whispers' treachery;—
The wrong accursed which your words imply.
I led my hero through encircling foes,
From kingly lovers my dauntless one I chose,
Nor sank my woman's head at danger nigh.
But thus to call and hear no fond reply!
To pray the winds his secret to disclose,
And hear, resounding, but the smitten shore
Its wild plaint utter to the torturing wave!
I wait with longing heart; no answer, save
The cry of sea-birds and the torrent's roar.
Avaunt, false fears! I will not be your slave.
My deathless faith walks with me evermore!

THE SHUTES OF SHEFFIELD.

My wife and I had given much thought to the question of house-rent and decided that we should not be justified in exceeding £120 a year; but we hoped to find a pretty little place in the country at that rent. Our requirements were modest. "Give me a well-cooked chop and a glass of sherry and I can rough it anywhere," said the intending traveler. We only wanted a thoroughly pleasant house, within easy distance of a country town where there was good society, a really good garden, a stable and coach-house and a few fields. We had looked at many houses, when one day, after a morning of disappointment, we saw a charming one standing some little distance from the road, and a notice informed us it was to be let. We went to see it. It was simply perfect, and was surrounded by a garden which I loved at first sight. It was sheltered from every cold wind and open to every benign influence, and full of the most beautiful old-fashioned flowers, all growing as if they had been at home there for years! A single glance showed me that some that I had long been vainly trying to cultivate were flourishing here with happy indifference to human care. My wife was delighted with the house—so was I—but it was the garden which completely carried me away. It was not very large, but there were open walks and pretty, secluded paths, and roses and fruit trees—a lawn and magnificent flower borders. Having once seen that garden, I never could be satisfied with any other.

"It's pretty, sir," said the housekeeper, observing how lovingly my eyes dilated. "A many pretty flowers grows here. They grow of their own accord like, for the gardener has little trouble with them."

"The gardener!" I exclaimed; "I never let people of that kind run riot among my flowers!"

"Oh, lor, sir, well to be sure! But there has always been a gardener here. That's his cottage there, behind the trees," and she pointed out a pretty red cottage across the lawn. Little was visible but the tops of some dormer-windows, for a high trellis covered with roses screened it from view.

"What's the rent of Fairlawn?" I asked in a sudden fear, for the little bit I saw of the gardener's cottage was so well built that it alarmed me.

"One hundred and sixty pounds, sir."

My wife's countenance fell. With prompt decision she took off her spectacles, put them carefully in their case and stowed them away in her bag as no longer needed.

"One hundred and sixty pounds," I repeated very sadly.

"Yes, my dear, that settles it," said my beloved wife; but she had no idea what regret I was feeling.

"I suppose it's no use thinking of it," said I, with a sigh; "but I never saw flowers do so well in any garden before."

"Come, John," said my wife. "It's only tiring ourselves for no purpose—we had better go. You know as well as I do that we ought not to saddle ourselves with such a high rent."

"Stop! I have an idea," said I, joyously. "We might reduce the rent by letting that cottage!"

"So you might, sir," interposed the housekeeper. "It has six good rooms and a kitchen. It was let a little while back to the curate. It's only the last year or two the gardener has had it."

We went to the cottage, and when I saw what an excellent house it was I decided to take Fairlawn. I settled the matter at once, and in ten days began to move in. I gave the cottage a name likely to inflame ardent and poetical minds, called it Eglantine cottage and advertised it freely. It had a veranda covered with roses and a pretty little garden of its own in front sloping down to the high road. We had established ourselves at Fairlawn, brought our dear only daughter home from school and returned most of the calls made on us by the resident gentry before we had an application for the cottage. At last a gentleman came—a man of five-and-thirty, with bushy, brown hair, keen, inquiring gray eyes and a singularly intelligent face. His name was Shute. He had studied for the bar, but was forced to live in the country on account of his wife's health, and now devoted himself to art. They had no children and did not object to a £40 rent, though I myself had feared it was rather too much. All was soon settled, provided the references he gave me were satisfactory.

They were most satisfactory. Each of the two responsible and well-to-do gentlemen to whom I wrote had the greatest pleasure in testifying to the high character of the gentleman who wished to be my tenant, and each, concluded by saying that such testimony on his part was almost unnecessary, seeing that the said gentleman was one of the Shutes of Sheffield. I read this, and straightway a fine flavor of respectability attached itself to my tenant—he was one of the Shutes of Sheffield. This being the case, I dedicated to his enjoyment the larger part of a large hamper of fine ferns which had been sent me from Cumberland, and went and planted them myself in telling spots. That done, I tied up his roses so that his wife might have the full benefit of their beauty. And now all care was over, and we were really happy at Fairlawn. My wife had her pony carriage and explored the neighborhood, and I had my garden and my box of books from the library. Mr. Shute's furniture began to arrive, and Mr. Shute himself came to see all made ready for his delicate wife. He stayed with us, but he was so busy that we did not see much of him. He was, however, a very pleasant fellow, and we liked him.

"I won't trouble you with my furniture-arranging difficulties, my dear Mr. and Mrs. Peveril," said he, "but there is one little favor I should like to ask of you. Would you mind having that trellis lowered a little? It would be such a treat to my poor wife to have just a glimpse of your exquisite garden from her sofa. She is so unfortunate as to be almost a confirmed invalid."

"I shall be very glad—" I began.

"Thank you! I felt sure you would be kind. Shall I give orders to have the trellis removed, or will you?"

"Removed!" I had imagined that he said 'lowered.' Now, I like to throw off my coat and waistcoat when I am working in my garden—but one can't behave ill to a delicate woman.

"She is coming to-morrow," said he; "there is no time to lose."

I had not the courage to plead for its only being lowered, and now the windows of Eglantine cottage raked my happy hunting grounds, where I had hitherto been so full of liberty and so alone. My heart ached for the poor roses which had been thrown down with the trellis. Mr. Shute began to pluck them, and said he would put them in water to help to make the house gay for his wife. Then he threw them down, exclaiming: "After all, she won't be here to-morrow. I am sure you will give me a handful of fresh ones in the morning."

"You have roses of your own," said I impatiently; for he had flung down all those he had just gathered—and it infuriates me to see flowers ill-treated.

"I know I have," said he calmly; "but I don't want to touch mine. They make the front of the house look well. My wife, Mr. Peveril, is quite the creature of impression! Come and see how you like the look of the little place now that the furniture is in."

Everything looked most charming. The rooms were large and low, with low, wide-latticed windows and window seats. The view into my garden was delicious. I never thought the Shutes paid too much rent after I had seen that. Their furniture was of the "Queen Anne" time, and suited the rooms to perfection. Eglantine Cottage was infinitely prettier than Fairlawn. I began to feel unbounded respect for this scion of the Shutes of Sheffield, for all this delightful result had been obtained so easily. There was very little furniture in the drawing room; the floor was covered with Indian matting and Persian rugs; the curtains were of Japanese muslin; the walls hung with the most exquisite water colors in perfectly simple wooden frames. There were twelve or fifteen magnificent Turners! I had only one, the gift of a rich uncle, and I was accustomed to consider it a priceless possession. Mr. Shute actually had thirteen, and a Girtin and a Barrett as well! Besides this, there were shelves full of beautiful china plates I had never seen such a dainty abode before. Such richly hung walls were a most agreeable sight to a landlord! Full of comforting inner warmth, I exclaimed: "Well, there is no fear of Mrs. Shute not admiring this!"

"You think so?" said he; "I'm so glad! I have had to be very careful what I did. You see, she is quite the creature of impression. I should be miserable if she said the cottage was not pretty. By the bye, did you know that she was one of the Wilmots of Taunton?"

Now I was not going to stand that. I had made up my mind to feel a great respect for the Shutes of Sheffield, and, if they had as good an idea of furnishing as Edward Shute, they were emphatically worthy of it; but I was not going to allow myself to be so much impressed by any other family. Besides, what were the Wilmots of Taunton to me? I was well acquainted with every rose that was grown. I know every pansy worthy of a place in my garden, but—I had never heard of the Wilmots of Taunton.

We went over all the rooms; one was fitted up as a studio. Mr. Shute's easel was set up, his color box and palettes were ready, but, of course, he had not begun to work so early.

"I shall be glad when I get her safely here," said he. "By the by, how am I to fetch her from the railway station? Do you mind lending me the pony carriage?"

I said I would lend it to him; but wished he had not said the pony carriage; if he had said your pony carriage it would not have looked so much like a vehicle which belonged just as much to him as to me.

Mrs. Shute was a tall, pale, languid-looking woman of eight-and-twenty, with fair hair—which was by no means all her own—and dull blue eyes. She spent most of her time on the sofa.

"I do so wish we had a little bit of ground at the back of the house," said Mr. Shute one day to his wife; "if it were ever so small. My poor wife never gets out; she can't sit in our garden, for it is so near the road, and being so much in the house and so dull."

Having said this he looked anxiously into her eyes, to see how much Christian charity she possessed.

My wife, poor dear woman, was taken by surprise, and replied: "I wish Mrs. Shute would use our garden sometimes—when my husband is not working in it, I mean; for when he is busy he likes to be careless about appearances."

"Oh! thank you. How truly kind!" exclaimed Mr. Shute. "Then we will have a key made. You know there is a door from our back yard into your garden, and we will have a key made for it at once, unless you have one you can lend us."

And now my poor wife knew what she had done; for, of course, it was out of the question for an invalid like Mrs. Shute to walk all the way around by the lane to the proper entrance, and yet, if she had a key, and could come and go when she liked, all my pleasure in my garden would be gone. "You won't go when my husband is at work!" she said, in desperation, to Mrs. Shute, and then trusted to her delicacy. What a poor, weak thing to trust to!

They got the key—they used it. Mrs. Shute, who was not strong enough to go round to the proper entrance, meandered for miles along our gravel paths and lawn. I could always trace her presence, for she plucked every flower she fancied, and flung it as quickly away, and I saw my slaughtered innocents lying bruised and withered in the sun, and could have slain her in turn. Mrs. Shute might be the creature of impressions, but the flowers were the creatures of impressions too, and bore the marks of her ridiculous high-heeled shoes as she crushed them down in her indifference and passed on. For some little time she respected my feelings and never entered the garden when I was at work. Soon, however, she came when she chose, and frequently I, hard at work in my gray flannel shirt, would see a sylph-like form arrayed in spotless white glide toward me and seemed determined to enter into a prolonged conversation. If I moved away, Mrs. Shute was certain to follow me. It was best to try not to mind her being there, and let her sit admiring her pretty feet and open-worked stockings, and uttering weak little remarks.

She was always affable. "I see, Mr. Peveril, you are quite au bout des doigts with all your flowers!" she said one day, most kindly.

"H'm," I replied. "Yes, I like flowers."

"So do I! I worship them! I even admire a lot of great ugly ferns we have in our garden!" Thus did the creature of impression speak of the lovely, rare ferns which I had sacrificed to the tenants who were to help me pay my rent.

"Don't you like ferns?" I said, half inclined to make an effort to get them back again.

"Well, yes, in the woods; but I like Pelargoniums in the gardens; nothing looks better. If I had plenty of money I'd just put hundreds of them in front of our house. What a thing money is, Mr. Peveril and there are actually some people who are so crowded with it that they don't know what to do with it but make an ostentation of it!"

"I am very sure I should know what to do with mine, if I had a little more," was my thought—for I was forced to endure this lady's company for want of a miserable £40 a year.

She perhaps found me unusually dull, for she said she would "stroll about a bit," and, hastily knotting up a "guinea switch of hair" which was rolling down her back, she went away. Presently she returned with the Grosvenor book which I was looking forward to the treat of reading when my work was done. She had obtained it by thrusting in her arm at the open window, and removing it from the table where it was lying awaiting my return. She and her husband too were extremely fond of possessing themselves of whatever they happened to want. She borrowed a book in this nefarious way. He came in a panic—his wife was ill; would we let him have half a dozen bottles of old port? Or he was suddenly seized with admiration of one of our water-colors. We had three good ones, but he was not satisfied with anything less than our Turner, and asked if we would allow him to take it to the cottage for an hour or two, and place it on an easel near his wife's sofa—it would help to wile away the weary hours, and she was the—

Rather than hear him say that she was the creature of impression I hastened away to get the picture for him. His wife did not care for pictures; why did he borrow them for her? She did not care for books either. She was entirely uneducated, and though possibly a Wilmot of Taunton, she certainly was not a lady. She wished to be pleasant, though, and was very fond of sympathizing with me whenever she happened to observe certain small green insects which she called "nasty afrites" on my roses. Had she been reading The Persian and Turkish Tales? I wished an ill-disposed afrite would carry her off—but nothing ever did carry her away from my side but the sight of the gardener going toward the kitchen garden. Then she said in a moment, "Dear Mr. Peveril, Edward and I are so fond of fresh vegetables—may I go and ask that man to cut some little trifle for the cottage?" and I, rejoicing at this momentary good fortune, always said, "Oh, pray do." And she went and commanded him to bear to her abode cauliflowers and peas, lettuces, apricots, or whatsoever else was agreeable to the palate of a creature of impression. For my part, I should not have cared what went to the cottage as long as nothing came from it—to sit by my side, I mean. But my wife said too much went. They had new-laid eggs, milk, cream, and more butter than we could well spare, and they did not pay as they got it, but let the account run on.

"Be patient," said I; "don't complain, and don't offend them. We should have been very hard up without these Shutes, for I have spent more than I ought on the house and garden, and it is an immense comfort to have such rich tenants. They must be rich, for those pictures on their walls are worth thousands. Don't let us think of the Shutes. Let us enjoy our happiness!"

Our dear daughter had got a lover—not a declared one, but one who was evidently in earnest. He was a thoroughly conscientious, upright man, and had a small estate which had been in his family for a couple of centuries. Our joy of this made us tolerant of the Shutes. The young folks met constantly, and the more we saw of Mr. Ducie the more we liked him. Perhaps it was a lucky thing that Mrs. Shute liked sitting on my lawn better than driving with my wife, for if she had used our pony carriage my daughter would have had to stay at home, and Mr. Ducie would have had fewer opportunities of seeing her.

One day, after irritating me by calling my pentstemons antirrhinums, when I should have disliked to hear her bestow such an appellation on my snap-dragons, she, who knew nothing of our secret hopes, suddenly exclaimed: "Mr. Peveril, don't you think that Mr. Ducie, who comes to your house, is a very charming young man? We have asked him to the cottage and he is coming. There are a great many nice young men in this neighborhood. I am going to invite my sister to come and stay with me—she is such a nice girl and so beautiful."

I could see the connection of ideas. She was going to invite her sister to the cottage in the hope of her fascinating some one—most probably our Mr. Ducie. This was fatal, for if Mrs. Shute made up her mind to deprive us of anything which seemed good in her eyes, nothing remained to us but to resign ourselves to letting her have it.

My poor Dorothea! I sighed heavily. That marriage on which we had set our hearts was not to be. Mrs. Shute's sister, a Wilmot of Taunton, and probably also a creature of impression, would come and win away Mr. Ducie's affections from my daughter, and my wife and I would be such fools that even we would allow ourselves to be drawn into doing our part towards producing that result. I was silent for some time; I was afraid she would notice it; I did not want her to know what we felt about Mr. Ducie, so I said: "I suppose your husband is hard at work this fine morning?"

"Yes, he is busy copying—painting, I mean," said she, in some confusion.

"Copying nature, I suppose," said I; but it occurred to me that considering he was a landscape painter, Mr. Shute stayed a great deal indoors.

Miss Wilmot came. She was as bright and rosy as Mrs. Shute was pale, and hardly had she arrived than the Shutes began to borrow our pony-carriage freely, and asked us to lend them our lawn for a tennis-party they wished to give, to introduce her.

"They want to invite Mr. Ducie!" I exclaimed, when my wife told me this: "It is too much! It's like seething a kid in its mother's milk!"

"And we shall have to supply the strawberries and the cream, and lend the teacups and teaspoons and a couple of servants! And she wants to borrow our long dining-table to place under a tree on the lawn, and has not got a table cloth long enough to cover it, but is sure that we have, and won't mind lending it, and"—

"Say no more," said I, decidedly. "We must draw the line somewhere, and I draw it at giving up Mr. Ducie to them."

He was there even while we were speaking; he told us of his visit afterwards, and said he thought Miss Wilmot a very charming girl, though it was easy to see that, like the fat boy in Pickwick, "he knew a nicerer;" but how long would he continue to put my Dorothea in the first place if those Shutes began to angle for him in earnest? Our experience was that they always managed to get what they wanted. He began to go to the cottage a great deal more than I liked. My wife said it was because from the Shutes' window he could sometimes see Dorothea walking in our garden. I did not know. Why did he not come to us?

He did come to us, and sometimes asked Dorothea to stroll with him in the garden, but no sooner did they go out than Mrs. Shute and Miss Wilmot joined them. I called the latter "the Abominable that uninvited came," but how could the mind revert to poetry in the midst of such vexation as this?

While everything was in this wretchedly uncomfortable state I received a letter from my uncle—the uncle I did not want to offend. It was rather cold, and it ended thus: "I think, John, you must now see that I had every reason to warn you against taking that foolishly expensive house of yours, but you need not have sold your 'Turner,' and you ought to have had at least another hundred for it. Besides, I would infinitely rather have lent you some money myself than have that exquisite drawing go out of the family."

It had not gone out of the family—I had not sold it and never meant to do so! It had been an act of great self-sacrifice to let it go to the cottage for a few days, but now I had got it back and would keep it. My uncle's letter made me feel inclined to go and look at the drawing. I took it down to enjoy it thoroughly. It had been taken out of its frame. Why had that been done? I at once went to the cottage to ask the question. The ladies were out. They had hired a carriage and gone to spend the day with Mr. Ducie's mother. They were evidently in terrible earnest about that affair, and it was a most significant feature that they had hired a carriage, instead of insisting on having ours.

"Mr. Shute is in the studio, sir; will you walk up stairs?" said the servant.

I walked up stairs, but he was not there. On the tables and easels I saw a number of water-color drawings in various stages of progress, all of which he was copying from others. Mr. Shute copied Turner drawings and sold them as originals! I saw it in a moment. And he had copied mine! Or had he perhaps sold the original and sent me back the copy? Then the drawings on his walls were copies too, and I had not such a well-to-do tenant after all, for those Turners on the walls had been my sheet-anchor of safety. Perhaps the refit of this cottage, for which I had sacrificed so much, would never be paid, and my cream and new-laid eggs, my fruit, my vegetables, my peace of mind—even my hopes for the future, were all to be as nothing. Letters with foreign stamps lay on the table, doubtless orders from the antipodes for valuable drawings, which my clever tenant had no difficulty in supplying, and even now his wife and her sister were twining their meshes round—

I looked up suddenly, and saw from the Shutes' window my Dorothea and Mr. Ducie walking in the garden below, hand in hand. Joy took possession of my heart. He had fled from the two Wilmot sirens in search of my Dorothea!

We never saw the Shutes again. That same evening they left Eglantine cottage. Next morning two emissaries of the law took possession of it. Mr. Shute was deeply in debt, but he had taken away nearly everything that was valuable. All that remained to satisfy the creditors was a certain amount of Indian matting, two pairs of flimsy curtains, a few rush-bottomed chairs, empty picture-frames and some furniture too heavy to be moved. The china plates which had looked so imposing were cracked in every direction and neatly mended. Not one of them was worth a shilling! Everything else was much the same. This little paradise of æstheticism had faded away in an hour or two.

My wife and I were so happy that we did not grieve over our lost rent. My uncle lent me £100, and three months afterward came to Dorothea's wedding, on which occasion he satisfied himself and me too that my Turner was still on my walls and that the estimable Mr. Shute of Sheffield had contented himself with making a copy. IN VAIN THE TINSELS.

Go, cull the stars from out the skies,
To feign the radiance of her eyes;
Braid films of gold with sunbeams rare,
To counterfeit her wealth of hair;
Take for her cheeks the softened blush
 Of roseate sunset on the snow;
And, for her lips, suppose you crush
 The richest rubies earth can show;—

Nay, semblance poor! No alchemy
 Could o'er her perfect self attain;
The tinsels of the earth and sky
 Were all in vain!

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

A Little Girl's Room.

Decorator and Furnisher: As suggestive of what may be done, I can not do better than describe a room recently fitted up for a city clergyman's little daughter by the ladies of his congregation as an expression of their regard. The walls were covered with paper in a pretty design of dasies and bluets (ragged sailors) upon a creamy, latticed ground. The ceiling was painted sky blue, with dome effects given by deepening the colors toward the edges. Two or three feathery clouds heightened the illusion, and a flight of three or four swallows swept across the skyey surface toward the windows. The carpet was only remarkable for its harmony with the situation, being simply an ordinary Brussels, with a ground matching the wall paper tint, and so closely covered with small spring flowers that the effect was almost chene. A dark blue border and one or two rugs relieved the eye and prevented a garish appearance. The doors and window-frames were fortunately of ash, and so in thorough accord with the predominant tint of the room, which was blue. The window curtains were models of dainty simplicity. They were made of cottage drapery, a figured Swiss muslin, rather thicker than the dress material of that name, and woven with a border on one selvedge, which repeated the center pattern; in this case the figure was a daisy the size of a dime, with a line of the same flowers twice the size between two strips, for a border. The novelty about the curtains was an addition made by cutting two horizontal strips, two inches long, across the border, between the stripes, at intervals of six inches apart, and buttonholing the edges loosely, making a succession of bias, in and out of which was slipped a blue ribbon two inches broad. Bands and bows of the same ribbons were used for looping the curtains back.

The furniture was of bamboo, and all of the pieces were of smaller size than the same articles in ordinary rooms, yet not sufficiently dwarfed to be useless. A miniature lounge and two easy chairs were covered with buff and cretonne, and blue ribbon bows were tied upon the upper corners of the graceful little cane-seat chairs. The small bed was low, with an airy extension of bamboo rods at the head springing up to hold a large ring, through which a curtain of Swiss muslin, like those at the windows, was drawn. A folding bamboo screen in front of the mantel had two panels of cream and two of blue sateen. The former were decorated with snow balls and bluets in arrasene embroidery, the latter with daisies in ribbon work. The armoire and chiffonier were a third smaller than full-sized furniture, and the dressing bureau was of similar dimensions. All the dainty toilet appointments of the latter were decorated with blue and the frame of the long dressing-glass was covered with a full ruche of blue silk. Some choice engravings and colored photographs representing phases of childhood and girlhood were hung upon the walls by blue cords and tassels and the small book-shelves were filled with such books as young people enjoy. In deference to the newly-awakened fears of even the best plumbing in sleeping-rooms, there was no stationary basin, but a washstand, en rapport with the other furniture, held a quaintly modeled antique toilet set with a dado design of water plants upon cream color, with swallows above on a sky-blue ground. Replacing the door of a large closet was a portiere of Swiss muslin, which being drawn revealed a playhouse on a scale so expansive and complete that it might be questioned whether dolls or their owner were most charmingly lodged.

A Poor Girl's Room.

A poor girl could have her humble bed chamber furnished in white, but it need not be an expensive stuff to look well; far from it. She might have her lounge and two arm chairs covered with white dimity, always kept clean as possible, and removable when they need washing; a white wide flounce of the same around the bottom of the lounge, as also around the easy chair. If she have a taste for embroidery, she could work her humble initials on the pretty swiss-muslin toilet articles, which she might adorn with cheap, pretty lace. Her floor might be covered with a dark, not easily soiled, Brussels carpet, no white carpet or rugs for her, and no polished floor, for she is not supposed to have a maid whose business is to keep it as smooth as satin. She might indulge, however, in a plain dimity bed spread, with a ruffle of very wide lace at 15 cents a yard, plenty to be had at the big shops. Then if, as I have before said, she possess an embroidery talent, she might embroider her initials in very raised letters on it, in plain white marking-cotton. Her knick-knacks must be of the simplest, yet tasteful; a big palm-leaf fan covered with lace and ribbon, a hat filled with stuffed kittens, atrocious as it may sound it would look pretty, one looking out at one end and the other at the opposite side, with blue and pink ribbons tied round their precious necks. The rich girl has the advantage here, as in all temporal things, that she has the means to go out a great deal, and also to entertain, that is if she is in good society, and as she gets many pretty things for her room from lunches, germans and dinners. The ceiling of the poor girl may not be frescoed, but it may be white-washed or kalsomined. The walls may be less cold by being hung with muslin, slightly shirred at the top and bottom, and of about four feet in width; but perhaps that "would bring the ceiling down," cry the eager critics, but, mes chers amis, that is very much the fashion just now, to have the ceilings very low. Not to know that argues yourself unknown to fashionable circles.

A Rich Girl's Room.

It might be furnished in white camel's hair or serge, with soft, cozy arm chairs and lounge. The bed might be covered with a large bed spread of the same material, and bordered all around with swan's down, and in the center the monogram of the fair owner could be worked in silver or in thick white silk, which, if not so pretty, would at least never tarnish. The toilet bureau should be of ash, with bright, silver-plated ornaments, like the rest of the furniture; and an oval-shaped toilet mat of white cloth bordered with down and embroidered with the owner's monogram, like the bedspread, would be very pretty, with an elegant pin cushion to match. Every article in the room should be marked with the young lady's monogram. The carpet of this charming room might be of white moquet, with a colored border one foot wide; or, instead of a carpet, the floor could be of polished wood, with a fine white wool mat or two. The walls should be frescoed in cream color, with a dance of cupids or some other airy subject, and the ceiling should also be frescoed with a cream colored ground and a lovely figure of a young girl, representing Innocence or an Undine among water lilies, but not the hackneyed Aurora. All sorts of pretty knick-knacks should hang about on the walls, on the backs of chairs, on sconces—everywhere. And there should always be large cream and rose colored bowls full of delicious hot-house flowers. Isn't that a fascinating room?

Matinees.

For cool mornings indoors at this season of the year a warm flannel or cashmere matinee becomes an object of the greatest comfort, indeed, so universal are such things, and all kinds of morning gowns, worn nowadays, that they are among the absolutely necessary articles of a wardrobe at all times. If one has a number of old skirts it is desirable to wear out, a long, plain sacque of maroon opera flannel, or of dark blue, or even dark green, with perhaps a little ecru embroidery on the sleeves and down the front, and a knot of ribbon at the throat, is the most suitable investment. We confess to an objection to pale blues, pinks, white cashmere, pale gray, and so on, worn with any manner of skirt. A plain black silk skirt is the only exception, and even that must be tolerably nice. When matinees of that kind are chosen they should have a skirt to match. It is generally quite plain, save for a little flounce or plaiting on the edge, and tolerably full. The matinee is long enough to more than half cover it.

One of the prettiest matinees possible was one of pale gray cashmere and scarlet satin we were shown quite recently. The skirt had three little bias ruffles, but very slightly fulled, and beneath them was another, still narrower, of red satin. The sacque was closely fitted and had in front a vest of satin cut into two long sharp points. A double jabot creamy lace was carried down each side of the vest and half concealed it. More ruchings of lace were inside the high straight satin collar and the plain satin cuffs. In the back the material was laid in two wide box plaits below the waist line, and over them was a sash bow of broad red satin. On both sides were large square pockets lined with red satin and finishing off with a frill of lace and a knot of ribbon. Another long knot of ribbon was fastened at the throat. Matinees of ecru or white or grayish lace, in the piece, made up over transparents of colored satin, silk or surah are among the most elegant imported examples. One of these is of ecru lace laid over brick-red taffeta. The petticoat has a ruching of red at the foot. The matinee fits closely, is cut away like a redingote in front and has a green jabot of lace over the bust, with odd knots and ends of ribbon interspersed and a deep shirred collar of taffeta, edged with lace in the back. Above the plaits, into which the redingote is laid behind, is a sash of red watered and satin ribbon, in broad stripes. A pair of red satin slippers are sent over to match this charming morning gown. The same idea may be carried out in blue, in mauve, in pink.

English and French Women.

London Standard: The French are very fond of decrying the women of our country as a flat-chested, long-membered, large-footed race, awkward in gait, ill-dressed or over-dressed, unlearned in the elementary rules of that important matter, the dressing of the hair, and incapable of harmonizing colors. These criticisms are ill-natured and exaggerated, but, nevertheless, a good many grains of truth underlie them. Take a London and a Parisian shop-girl as an example. The former has generally the advantage over the latter in clearness of complexion and in comeliness, yet she loses by the comparison. She is neither so becomingly dressed nor so careful to suit the color of her dress to her complexion, nor so neatly shod; and, above all, she seems to be ignorant of the resources an abundant head of hair affords her, as a frame to an attractive, youthful countenance. The horrible, barbarous fashion of cutting the hair short, which obtains no favor in France, prevails, I observed, with real regret, to a considerable extent in London; and, when the scissors have not been ruthlessly applied to masculinize the female head, there seems to be a deplorable want of taste displayed in the arrangement of their tresses by London girls. Those I met out, those I saw behind the counter, appeared to have a peculiar penchant for screwing their hair up into tight, ugly little knots, singularly ungraceful—so I thought, at all events from the sight of Parisienne heads. The appearance of the London nursemaid also contrasted unfavorably with that of the French bonne. I do not refer to the elite of the calling in either country, but the ordinary middle-class nurse girl or bonne, such as one meets with in Kensington gardens or in the Tuileries. Perhaps the tasty cap worn by the latter, with its meter and a half of broad ribbon streamers behind, gives her an advantage; perhaps she holds herself better, or pays more attention to her general appearance. Whatever may be the cause, the result undoubtedly is that the eye rests with more pleasure upon a group of French nurses gathered together with their charges in a public garden than upon a similar group in a London park. To sum up my impression concerning London women of the middle or lower classes, they seemed, as a Frenchwoman would put it, vetues, not habillees—clothed, not dressed.

Servants.

I never shall forget, says a writer in the Boston Budget, the servants' sleeping rooms in a very simple household I once was in. Everything was fresh and clean and wholesome looking. The two iron bedsteads comfortably made, the window curtains spotless, the two bureaus neatly arranged, the floor nicely matted, and with a strip of carpet before each bed, and on the wall some pretty colored pictures. The mistress of this genial, simple house told me that she labored for a year before she could induce her two maids to see the beauty and comfort in such order, but now they felt it keenly, and it had affected their work and spirits very visibly. Near their kitchen was a small room, which Mrs. —— had fitted up snugly for a sitting-room and a place to take their meals in. There was a chest of drawers, in which were their napkins and table-cloths and their own bed linen, and a nice glass-doored case showed their china. My friend told me that for some time her maids actually preferred to use the kitchen, but she finally won them over to a great pride in their neat little room, and she said the effect upon their characters and work was speedily visible. Occasionally she would would bring in some flowers, or pretty, inexpensive ornament for them; she took a good illustrated weekly paper entirely for their use, requiring them to file it, and before long a genuine taste for refinement and surroundings and manner had developed. These two servants had come to her very uncouth and untutored, but certainly when I saw them, after three years' residence with Mrs. ——, they were far the most refined, respectful, and well-mannered servants I have ever seen in America. Of course some people would aver this sort of consideration would "spoil" a servant, but it seems to me that the very first means of teaching the servant of to-day what she ought to do, is to make her feel that her mistress' house is her home, the place in which she is to live, not the place she is to work in as little as possible and escape from during every possible hour.

A Romance.

The story of the courtship and marriage of Dr. Hammond's daughter by the Italian nobleman whose title and name she wears is as romantic as any of her novels. The Marquis Lanza was first discovered by the family of a distinguished New York divine, while following the occupation of a waiter in a Paris restaurant. This family were particularly struck by the graceful manner in which he served their dinner, the noble air of condescension with which he accepted his pour boire, and the expression of gentle melancholy that spread itself over his handsome features. When his American patrons came to leave Paris they were sorry to part from their attentive garcon, and advised him to come to America. Time slipped away, and one evening the same family were dining at Delmonico's when who should appear before them, napkin on his arm, but their favorite Paris waiter. They were very glad to see him, and the wife of the divine, who is a very philanthropic woman, made up her mind that the young Italian was much above his position, and she determined to do something to better him. She no sooner thought than acted, and through some friends down town she got him an excellent position as foreign correspondent in an importing house. In a confidential talk with her one day he confessed that he was the impecunious scion of an ancient and noble Italian family. Here was a romance, a thing this amiable woman dotes on. She made inquiry through the proper channels and found the young man's story correct in every particular. Then she took him up socially and introduced him into society. There he met Dr. Hammond's accomplished daughter, who now writes her name Clara, Marchioness Lanza.

Fall Wraps.

Black seems to be by far the most prevalent color for light wraps as for jackets, but some few very elegant ones are seen of lighter colors. There is a "jacket-waist intended for an outside wrap that looks well in any of the light golden browns, or what is called honey-colored cloth. It is, as its name indicates, a jacket-waist, but it has a pleated skirt falling to the knees; over this is a deep cape cut away in front, and has three deep folds, or pleats, in the back. It is extremely stylish, and in some materials would answer well for a matinee opera wrap. Then there are modified Mother Hubbard shaped light mantles, mostly lined with Venetian red, and finished by sash backs. These also will be worn at matinees. But the regulation color for street wraps and jackets should be black, whether it be a plain "tailor" jacket or the dressy satin "visite" lined with red surah and trimmed with real Spanish lace.

Lengthening Short Women.

The London World tells of a new contrivance for making ladies taller. The woman who is to undergo this process is encased in a very tight corset, and her feet are placed in shoes weighted with fifty pounds of lead each. She is then placed in a machine consisting of a ring, which encircles her waist, and is suspended from the ceiling at such a height as to prevent her feet from touching the ground. The pressure of the corset forces the upper part of her body upward, and the weight of the shoes stretches her from the waist downward. It is estimated that the extreme length to which the spine can be stretched by the process thus described is two inches, and that the knee and hip joints can be stretched an inch and a half more. Thus three inches and a half can be added to the height of almost any woman who has the courage to undergo the trouble and pain necessarily connected with a stretching process lasting, with brief intervals, during five or six months.

Plumage.

There are three new hats that are noted at the Paris salons this week—a toque of black tulle embroidered with Pompadour sprigs of bright flowers in front, a large, loosely-looped rosette of Rose du Barry ribbons, and in the midst of that a richly jeweled owl's head; a Henri IV. hat of yellowish long pile beaver, the brim flat and narrow on one side, a nest of mice forming a bow; a blue soft felt hat, on one side a bow of blue velvet and satin, on which is placed a bird with open wings, and from under which emerges a kitten's head.

A party of English young ladies, well chaperoned, recently sojourning at Montreal, Canada, carried slender switch-canes of ebony, with small gold heads, richly chased, and wore jockey caps of plain black velvet, which were most becoming and natty looking. Both cane and cap are said to be very fashionable abroad, both in England and France.

Astrakahn promises to be a favorite trimming for wraps and dresses. It is introduced in colors, making a novel material for parts of dresses. It comes in olive and red, blue and red, and brown and red. The lower skirt is to be made of any of these, with plain brown, blue or olive for the drapery, trimmed with the mixed goods.

The English fashion of cropping the hair short all over the head and forming it into little loose rings has again reached America, and many ladies are sacrificing their luxuriant tresses to the Moloch of the present mode.

The demand for kittens' heads for Parisian bonnets has become so important that cat breeding has become a regular business. Pigeons' wings and cocks' heads are also much worn.

Wide bracelets, heavily chased, and bangles, lace-pins and dog-collars of various patterns, all of solid silver, are again the height of fashion.

The muff of the season will be velvet or plush, to match the dresses, with a kitten or hirondelle de mer on the front.

For the Tooth.

Very delicate tea cake is made by beating the whites and yolks of six eggs separately. Mix two and a half ounces of very fine dry bread crumbs with four ounces of melted butter, add the beaten yolks, and two ounces of sugar, and a teaspoonful of grated lemon peel. Mix this together and then add gradually two ounces of chopped raisins, and a few blanched and chopped almonds, lastly stir in the beaten whites of the eggs. If the mixture seems too thin a little flour may be added. It is impossible to give definite directions because the bread crumbs are so likely to vary in weight. This should be baked in a moderate oven, and in a shallow tin which must be lined with paper on the bottom and sides. When done you may frost it or sprinkle powdered sugar over it.

An appetizing entree is made by taking cold boiled cabbage; chop it fine; for a medium-sized pudding dish full add two well beaten eggs, a tablespoonful of butter, three tablespoonfuls of cream with pepper and salt ad libitum. Butter the pudding dish, put the cabbage in and bake until brown.

Grape Jelly: Squeeze the juice from the grapes. This can be easily done, if one prefers, by heating the grapes slightly. Strain the juice and let it boil five minutes, while at the same time the sugar is heating. Add one pound of sugar to one pint of juice, and boil for ten minutes.

Plums: Take three-quarters of a pound of sugar to one pound of fruit. Make a syrup of the sugar and water, and boil from fifteen minutes to half an hour. Put in the plums a part at a time, and let them cook thoroughly.

To cook Lima beans in perfection they should simmer half an hour, then remove the cover, and let the water boil and evaporate until but little is left. Add cream, with plenty of butter in it for the gravy.

A STORY OF JENNIE LIND.

An Incident of Her Life—How She Won the Friendship of a Rival.

In 1847 Giulia Grisi and Jennie Lind were singing in London, but at different places. Each star struggled to outshine the other, and those who one evening went into ecstasies over Grisi's Norma were the next evening enraptured with Lind's Casti Diva. Such was the rivalry that it was not expected that they would sing together in a public concert. But Queen Victoria, thinking it a shame that two singers so eminent should be seperated by a petty jealously, requested both to appear at a court concert. Of course, they complied with the request. The queen cordially welcomed them together for the first time. She then gave the signal for the concert to begin. As Jennie Lind was the younger of the two, it had been arranged that she should sing first. With perfect confidence in her powers she stepped forward and began. But, chancing a glance at Grisi, she saw the Southron's malignant gaze fastened upon her. The fierceness of her look almost paralyzed her. Her courage left her, her voice trembled and everything before her eyes darkened. By the utmost exertion of her will, however, she succeeded in finishing her aria. The painful silence that followed its conclusion—a silence ever noticeable where those present are embarrassed—convinced her she had made a failure. The conviction was confirmed by the triumphant expression on Grisi's countenance. Despite the semi-torpidity of her happiness, the mortification and grief of her parents and friends. Suddenly something—it seemed like a voice from heaven—whispered; "Sing one of your old songs in your mother-tongue. She caught at the idea as an inspiration which had flashed into her mind between the termination of the vocal part of aria and the accompanist's final cords. She, unnoticed by the company, asked him to rise, and took the vacant seat. For a few seconds she suffered her fingers to wander over the keys in a low prelude; then she began to sing. Her selection was a little prayer which, in the long ago, she had loved above all other songs in her childhood's repertoie. She had not thought of it for years. As she sang she was no longer in the presence of royalty, but in her fatherland, surrounded by those who listen not to criticise. Not one of those before her understood the words of the "prayer," but the plaintiveness of the melody, and the inspired tones of the pure, sweet voice brought the moisture to every eye. There was the silence of admiring wonder. Then, having finished the "prayer," she lifted her mild blue eyes to her rival, whose flaming orbs had so disconcerted her, she found no fierce expression on her countenance, but instead a tear diamonding the long black eyelashes. A moment after, with the impulsiveness characterizing the children of the other tropics, Grisi rushed to Jenny Lind's side, placed her arm around the girl's neck and kissed her regardless of the lookers on.

A Mother's Devotion.

From the Boston Journal.

A very peculiar case of a mother's devotion to her son, a maniac, has just come to light. About eighteen years ago a family named Harrington moved to Portsmouth, R. I. Nearly four years after, a son, William, then about 2 years of age, suddenly disappeared. About three weeks ago the mother of the boy died. Some of the people at her funeral heard a strange noise, and on going to a small dark room in the attic found there a young man, having scarcely any clothing, covered with hair. The husband of the woman told the following story: The young man, he said, was his son, who had mysteriously disappeared so many years ago. When about 2 years old the boy became insane, and was soon a raving maniac. The mother refused to let him be taken from her, but placed him in an attic-room, where at times she was compelled to tie him. During all these years he had been confined there, and the mother was the only living person whom her son had seen. She was accustomed to visit him and feed him with her own hand, and had jealously guarded her secret from the neighbors, fearing that steps would be taken to tear the boy away from her. When she died her father attempted to follow her example, but was not equal to the task. Young Harrington has been removed to the Insane Asylum at Cranston, R. I.

Fred Mann, aged nineteen, who murdered the Cook family at L'Orginal, Canada, a few months ago, was hanged on the 12th inst. The history of the crime is in brief as follows: Mann attacked the elder daughter early in the morning, and evidence of criminal assault was discovered. Her he strangled. The mother entered the storehouse to see what kept her daughter, when the fiend strangled her with the same rope that had killed her daughter. He next killed the aged father with an axe, and afterward chopped up one of the boys in bed. He was trying to kill another, when the two sisters of the butchered boy came upon the scene, and, though both were wounded, they succeeded in driving him off after a desperate struggle. The New French War Minister.

When the Fallieres cabinet was on its last legs, the 30th of January, 1883, it was officially announced that Campenon had accepted the war office, but succeeding events falsified the statement. The retirement of the rich, royal, and aristocratic Orleanist officers was a job rather hard to let out, and only Thibaudin, who was generally detested for surrendering at Metz with Bazaine, was found willing to accept the task. Thibaudin has now served the purpose for which he was needed by the anti-Orleanists. Gen. Campenon is believed to be a staunch republican. When Napoleon III. strangled the republic, Campenon was arrested and exiled, he then being a staff officer. He betook himself to Tunis and devoted his attention to the reorganization of the boy's little army. But he soon returned to France, rejoined the army, and served in Algeria, in Italy and in China. In 1870 Campenon was chief of Gen. Legrande's staff, taking part in the celebrated charge in which that officer was killed. He was wounded and made prisoner, and spent some time at Aix-la-Chapelle. In 1875 Campenon was promoted to the rank of brigadier general, and four years later to that of general of division, with the command of the Fifth division of an infantry, garrisoned in Paris. The 14th of November, 1881, he became minister of war in Gambetta's cabinet, but resigned with Gambetta in January, 1882. He became a grand officer of the Legion of Honor in February of last year. He is a thorough soldier, tall, full of vigor and energy, and, with his record as a faithful supporter of Gambetta in his cloudy days, is extremely popular.

A SURPRISING DECISION.

The United States Supreme Court Pronounces the Civil Rights Act Unconstitutional.

DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 15.—A most important decision rendered by the supreme court of the United States was that in the five cases commonly known as the civil right cases, which were submitted to the court on printed arguments about a year ago. The titles of these cases and States from which they come are as follows:

No. 1. United States against Murry Stanley. From United States circuit court, district of Kansas.

No. 2. United States against Michael Ryan. From United States circuit court, district of California.

No. 3. United States against Samuel Nichols. From United States circuit court, Western district of Missouri.

No. 26. United States against Daniel D. Singleton. From United States circuit court, Southern district of New York.

No. 28. Richard A. Robinson and Wife against The Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company. From United States circuit court, district of Tennessee.

These cases were all based on the first and second sections of the civil rights act of 1875, and were respectively prosecutions under that act for not admitting certain colored persons to equal accommodations and privileges in inns or hotels, in railroad cars and in theaters. The defense set up, in every case, the alleged unconstitutionality of the law. The first and second sections of the act, which were parts directly in controversy, are as follows:

First—All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of accommodations, advantages, facilities and privileges at inns, public conveyances on land and water, theaters and other places of amusement, subject only to conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

Second—Any person who violates the first section shall be liable to forfeit $500 for each offense, to be recovered in civil action, and also to a penalty of from $500 to $1,000 fine, or imprisonment from thirty days to a year, to be enforced in criminal prosecutions. Exclusive jurisdiction is given to the district and circuit courts of the United States in cases arising under the law. The rights and privileges claimed by, and denied to colored people in these acts, were full and equal accommodations in hotels, in ladies' cars on railroad trains, and in dress circles in theaters. The court, in a long and carefully-prepared opinion by Justice Bradley, holds:

First—That congress had no constitutional authority to pass the sections in question, under either the Thirteenth or Fourteenth amendment to the constitution.

Second—That the Fourteenth amendment is prohibitory upon the States only, and that legislation referred to therein as to be adopted by congress for enforcing that amendment is not direct legislation on a matter respecting which States are prohibited from making or enforcing certain laws ordering certain acts, but is corrective legislation necessary or proper for counteracting and redressing the effects of such law or laws that in forbidding States, for example, to deprive any person of their liberty or property without due process of law, and giving congress power to enforce prohibition, it was not intended to give congress power to provide due process of law for the protection of life, liberty, and property, which would embrace almost all subjects of legislation, but to provide modes of redress for counteracting the operation and effect of State laws obnoxious to prohibition.

Third—That the thirteenth amendment gives no power to congress to pass the sections referred to because that amendment relates only to slavery and involuntary servitude which it abolished and gives congress power to pass laws for its enforcement. That this power only extends to the subject matter of the amendment itself namely, slavery and involuntary servitude and necessary incidents and consequences those conditions; that it has nothing to do with different races or color, but refers to slavery. The legal equality of different races, and classes of citizens being provided for in the fourteenth amendment, which prohibits States from doing anything to interfere with such equality; that it is no infringement on the thirteenth amendment to refuse to any person equal accommodations and privileges in an inn or place of public entertainment however it may be a violation of his legal rights; that it imposes upon him no badge of slavery or involuntary servitude, which is simply some sort of subjection of one person to another and incapacity incidental thereto, such as inability to hold property, to make contracts, to be parties in court, etc., and that if the original civil rights act, which abolished these incapacities, might be supported by the thirteenth amendment, it does not therefore follow that the act of 1875 can be supported by it.

Fourth—That this decision affects only the validity of the law in the States, and not in the Territories or District of Columbia, where the legislative power of congress is unlimited, and it does not undertake to decide what congress might or might not do under the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and amongst the several States, the law not being drawn with any such power.

Fifth—That, therefore, it is the opinion of the court that the first and second sections of the act of March 1, 1875, entitled "An act to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights," are unconstitutional, and judgment should be rendered upon indictments accordingly.

At the conclusion of the reading of Justice Bradley's opinion, which occupied more than an hour, Justice Harlan said, under ordinary circumstances and in an ordinary case, he should hesitate to set up his individual opinion in opposition to that of his eight colleagues, but in view of what he thought the people of this country wished to accomplish, what they tried to accomplish and that they believed they had accomplished by means of this legislation, he must express his dissent from the opinion of the court. He had not had time since hearing that opinion to prepare a statement of his grounds of dissent, but he should prepare and file one as soon as possible, and in the meantime desired to put upon record this expression of his individual judgment.

A JAVANESE WEDDING.

A Recent "Swell" Event in Antipodean Society.

From the London Standard.

The following is, from a private letter just received from Java: "The village through which we passed was en fete—garlands of leaves and flowers hung across the road, while a broad avenue leading off to the right was a mass of whitened earthy pots set upright on smaller pots. To our astonishment we were whisked down this avenue, and found ourselves in an immense courtyard filled with natives—there must have been hundreds of them. Before we had time to think what it all meant the carriage stopped and a very dapper Javanese approached, bowing and smiling and holding out his hand. Our salutations exchanged, he beckoned us to go with him to the Pan-doppo, a raised place, covered over, in the middle of the square and opposite to his own house, for he turned out to be the wydono, or chief man of the village.

"On this dias were a sofa, chairs and tables; and after we had been placed in the seat of honor we were presented with wine, tea, brandy and the inevitable gin and bitters, while our amiable host and some half-dozen native chiefs talked away in Malay, of which we knew not a word. Imagine our position! tired—very hungry and seeing no prospect of getting out of this affair. The court was gradually filling with natives, while the gammelong, the national musical instrument, was kept going in a deafening manner. Evidently there was something expected; and at last, after an eternity of waiting, a procession filed in, consisting of many mounted wydonos and about a half a dozen men naked to the waist, painted over with yellow paste—a most hideous sight—and carrying immense red and yellow banners.

Then followed people carrying offerings of fruit and flowers; and finally two closed carriages followed by two men hideously painted with ochre and prancing on enormous pasteboard horses. They looked too comical with the long sticks between their legs. They were accompanied by an old haggard woman, decked out with flowers, paper tassels &c. Naked to the waist, with her gray hair loose, the contortions of this old lady and the pride with which she threw her head about were most amusing. Is this the end of our detention? we thought; but no! the wydono came smiling forward and escorted us to his house, where in a back room was an estrade covered with beautiful white cocoa nut matting, and here sat in state two of the most extraordinary figures possible—a woman whose face was one mass of ochre with fantastically painted eyebrows, her head, neck, arms and tunic covered with enormous diamonds; her companion a man painted in like manner and wearing a tall hat encircled with diamonds and his ears covered with large pointed ass's ears of gold, also heavily enriched with diamonds.

"Behind this singular pair were two women, half-naked and painted yellow, holding peacocks' tails in their hands, while behind them again were two dummy figures similarly painted. The room was crammed with natives, and you may imagine our feelings when our host directed us to ascend the dais, himself remaining behind. After many signs and much hesitation we had to get up, and with our travel-stained boots to advance to those personages, who then rose and held out their hands to us. The wydono, evidently pitying our uncertainty, then motioned to us to come away, and soon we found ourselves in a room where a comfortable luncheon was prepared. After this repast, to our great relief, we were allowed to depart, our host giving me his arm most politely to the carriage. It was not until the evening that we learned that the ceremony we had witnessed was the marriage of a regent's or prince's daughter with some Javanese functionary and that we happened on all the show by mere chance, the Resident of Dyocka having desired the wydono of that village to entertain us at tiffin. If we had only known!"

WHEN YOU SEE BOYS.

The Young America in Various Situations.

From the Burlington Hawkeye.

When you see a boy coming down the street with a ball of cord in his hand and a look on his serious face like that worn by the picture of an early Christian father standing in the arena waiting for the new lion to be called out to dinner, it is a sign that if you cast your eyes upward you can see that boy's kite dancing nimbly in the air to the lascivious pleasing of a whole colony of telegraph wires.

When you see a boy going along in the merry, merry sunshine with his hat in his hand, shaking his hair with a pine stick to get it dry, now and then leaning his head on one side, pounding the other side with his hand and practically kicking his feet in the air, in desperate efforts to get the water out of his ears; or when you see him holding a warm stone to his ears for the same purpose, it is a true sign that you may think of that boy, by and by, standing speechless when his mother asks him how his shirt came to be wrong side out. You must not run down the street in the direction of his home under the impression that the boy is being murdered. You can't kill a boy with a slate strap. And in hoc signoes you will know that boy has been in swimming when he should have been at school learning that twenty six prepositions are followed by the accusative, all the way from ad to ultra.

"When you see a boy with the pockets of his pantaloons bulging out until he looks like a great bumble bee laden for the hive, while he walks along trying to look as thin as a split lath and wearing a profound expression of supernatural innocence, you know without referring to this code of signals that boy has been lingering in somebody's orchard and doesn't care to have undue publicity given to facts that only concern him personally.

And wherever, and whenever you see him in mischief or out of it—that is just coming out of it or just ready to get in some more; awfully bad, or with many tearful failures and disgraceful stumbles trying to be good; forgetting your commandments which thunder upon him by the hundred, well nigh as readily and repeatedly as you forget the ten that infinite wisdom has laid upon you; in all his noise, his poor little struggles, temptations, triumphs and failures, his piteous little troubles and his tearful, honest penitence, in all the lightness of a boy's life, your heart must grow mellow and tender for the little germ of manhood, so full of wonderful possibilities, so rich with seeds of strength that will ripen bye and bye, for good or for evil, as you walk and live before the boy; even as you look at him, remember what you were thirty or forty years ago, and say, "God bless the boy."

POSSUM AND POTATOES.

Two Night's Experience With the Possum—A Feast Fit for a King.

From the Americus (Ga.) Recorder.

In a barber-shop one day last week, while several gentlemen were waiting for a shave, the conversation turned on good things to eat. After discussing various dishes, Joe Roney, who is considered a connoisseur, and who had taken an active part in the discussion, said: "Well boys, you can all talk about good things to eat, but the best thing in the world I ever tasted was possum, hedged in with brown gravy and sweet potatoes with sugar on them." It struck us that Joe knew what he was talking about and we determined to investigate the first time we had an opportunity. We soon had the chance. Mr. Walt Furlow extended an invitation soon after to go out to his plantation and assist in a genuine, old-fashioned possum hunt, with an hour or two for squirrels thrown in. We suppose there is hardly a man in southwest Georgia who has not experienced the glories of a possum hunt. It is not for their benefit, therefore, that we write these lines. Possibly the ladies may not feel particularly interested in them, but we must beg the excuse that some one will, for we are full to overflowing with the good of the hunt, and must tell some one. On every plantation there is one or more darkies who do the possum and coon hunting; who can tell you to a hair's breadth where to find them. Mr. Furlow's plantation is no exception. There is a negro there named Jim that knows all about it, and what he don't know his dogs do. His dogs are his life and soul; he would rather you would steal his wife than his dogs, for that he reasons that another wife he could get, but another dog as good as Rock, Jack or Pup, never. Rock is his "boss dog," and when his deep bay is heard you can lay your last dollar and wager it that possum will be treed. The first night's experience was a tame one; we got into a dry piece of woods and struck but one possum track, but we got that possum.

The next night we had everything in fine shape, and between 8 and 9 o'clock we started out. Down the road to the woods we went, stopping long enough to get several handfuls of good lighter, and then into the forest we went. Scarcely fifteen minutes had passed before a bark was heard, succeeded a few moments later by another and then another. A trail had been struck. The voices of the dogs grew more frequent until at length a long continuous 'bay' from the direction of the leader announced that the 'possum was treed. A few moments walk brought us to him, but the scene around the tree baffles description. With bark after bark the dogs circled around, now shifting, and trying in vain to climb up the sapling. A few blows from the ax brought the tree down, and the next moment the possum was in the jaws of the dogs forty feet away. He had started to run as soon as the tree fell, but the dogs ran too quickly. As soon as they had a taste of him they were satisfied. It is remarkable, but a possum dog will never eat a possum or the bones of one. The same scene was repeated twice more, varied by long tramps through swamps, cotton and corn fields. The small hours of the morning had arrived when we went to bed, but we consoled ourselves with the thought of the feast we would have the next day, and such a feast it was!

On a big dish in the center of the table, brown and fat, the possum looked like it was good, but it was better than it looked. It was a meal fit for kings, but which anybody could have for the trouble of the hunt. It was the first possum we ever ate but if our legs hold out will not be the last.

Joe Roney was right. There is nothing that will beat the possum.

Entertaining a Burglar.

"A burglar can be a gentleman in manner as well as any one else, and the majority of them are men of refinement. I was at Saratoga a couple of years ago, and strolling into the dining room of a prominent hotel one day I espied one of the most notorious "knucks" in the business seated by the side of a wealthy banker. I was curious to see how the fellow would behave himself, and sitting close by, observed him. It wasn't long before his engaging manner completely won the old banker, and I laughed to myself when I saw the latter introduce him to a member of his family. I kept my eye on him, and later on actually heard the fellow invite him to a drive. I could scarcely believe the evidence of my senses. When the party returned I took the 'crook' to one side and asked what lay he was on. "For heaven' sake," said he, "don't give me away, I'm indulging in a little respectibility, and the atmosphere is improving my health." Cracksman though he was I had never known him to tell a lie, and when he pledged me his word never to take advantage of the old man's hospitality I was willing to believe him.

"Has any harm come of the thing since?"

"On the contrary, good has come of it for when an attempt was to be made about six months ago, to break into the banker's residence, this man gave notice to the department, and the thieves were thwarted. So you see there is something in the old saying after all, "it's better to have the good will of a dog."

Floating.

The human body weighs a pound in the water, and a chair will carry two grown persons; that is, it will keep the head above water, which is all that is necessary when it is a question of life or death. One finger placed upon a chair or stool, a small box, or a piece of board, will easily keep the head above water, while the two feet and other hand may be used as paddles to propel toward the shore. It is not at all necessary to know how to swim to be able to keep from drowning in this way. A little experience with the buoyant power of water, and faith in it, are all that is required. When pleasure boats capsize, everyone struggles to get on top of the the overturned or half-filled boat, and all are drowned, except those whom the wrecked craft would wholly bear up. If they would simply trust the water to sustain ninety-nine hundredths of the weight of their bodies, and the disabled boat the other hundredth, they might all be saved, under most circumstances. An overturned or water-filled wooden boat will sustain more people in this way than it will carry. It would keep the heads above water of as many people as could get their hands on the gunwale. These are simple facts, easily learned, and may some day save your life

The Sub-marine Tunnel Between Sicily and Italy.

According to the engineers' estimate, the length of the proposed submarine tunnel between Italy and Sicily will be 44,000 feet. The maximum depth of the sea above the line of the tunnel is 365 feet and the thickness of rock between the roof of the tunnel and the bottom of the sea will be 115 feet. The direction of the tunnel from St. Agata to Punta del Pizzo is almost due northeast to southwest. The two inclines descending to the tunnel will first run parallel with the shore and then descend to the lowest level by spiral tunnels; the length of these inclines is each 15,000 feet, the area occupied by each spiral tunnel 1,160 feet, and the degree of inclination thirty-five feet per 1,000. The centre of the tunnel will be on a higher level than the two ends: wells and subsidiary tunnels will be constructed to drain off the percolating water; and the most difficult part of the line will be first commenced.

The Election in Iowa.

Returns received up to the time of going to press with this side of our paper warrant the conclusion that Iowa has elected the entire republican ticket by nearly 30,000 majority. Some estimates prove the majority as high as 40,000. The ticket elected is as follows: Governor, Buren R. Sherman; Lieutenant Governor, Orlando H. Manning; Sup't of Public Instruction, John W. Akers; Justice of the Supreme Court, Joseph R. Reed.

The story comes from North Carolina of a dog that climbs trees after opossums and coons. He doesn't stick his toe nails in like a cat, but climbs like a boy. YANKEE NOTIONS.

Belief in Witches, Ghosts, and Hobgoblins Current in New England.

Col. George C. Fortesque has just returned from a trip to New England. He was met by a Denver News reporter and asked in relation to his impression of the people of that out of the way section. In reply to the questions of the reporter, he said:

"The love of the curious and the marvelous is not confined to any race or to any age of the world. Though the activities of the present age do not give people much time for superstition where any opportunities for its cultivation is given. It is pretty sure to spring up in some form or another. In no part of the country would one look for superstition more readily than in New England. The old houses to be found in such places as Nantucket and Salem seem as if ghosts have one day peopled them. They have passed through long generations of men, and their timbers still hold together. They have seen births, bridals, and burials. In Nantucket there used to be old families of rich shippers—many of whom found watery graves in the great deep where their activities lay. The whale fishery went down on account of the discovery of petroleum in Pennsylvania, but reminders of it still exist in the old houses with a look-out built on every roof, in wharves now used by excursion steamers, and the general aspect of a place that is still fifty years behind the times in many things. In Nantucket the popular vehicle with the old settlers is still a small one-seated cart, a kind of tip-cart, although not so heavy as the vehicle of that name so much used on New England farms. The best families still go to ride and make calls in their carts, which are apt to tip up when one gets out of them. In Nantucket there is another peculiar feature. The announcement of meetings, concerts, entertainments, and public gatherings generally is always made by a crier who rings a bell when he wants to collect an audience.

Salem and Nantucket look alike, but Salem is in many respects the more antique of the two. In the adjoining town of Peabody there is still to be seen Witch hill, where so many innocent people suffered from New England superstitions. The houses are still standing where the judges of that time lived, and on one of the principal Salem streets is to be seen a quaint old gabled house, where one of the supposed witches is said to have lived. The house is now inhabited by a corn doctor, who is making a fortune out of witch-hazel ointment. In another part of [illegible]ulous stranger is pointed to a house that is said to be the original of Hawthorne's house of seven gables. Hawthorne used to live in Salem, and probably gained a good inspiration for his tales and novels from the old house and their strange history. There are no witches in Salem, but there are to be seen there some of the handsomest and best preserved matrons and some of the prettiest young ladies to be found in all New England. There is an air of romance about the place yet, and it is no wonder that those who have visited it, who have passed through the quaint old streets, and have learned the history of its earlier days should be so prolific in writing novels and essays, and histories pertaining to the Salem witchcraft.

"But it is not of Salem, but of Lynn, a seaport city some ten miles away, known all over the world for its shoe manufactures, that I remember the most traditions. In the days of the revolution, and before it, that part of Massachusetts was not so well known for its manufactures as now. What is now Lynn, Nahant, and Swampscott, was at that time a quaint New England locality, quite as noted for its superstitions as Salem itself. Having a pretty fair harbor, it used to be a favorite resort for pirates, privateersmen and other notorious characters. People in these precarious callings are always prone to believe in witchcraft and fortune-telling, and it is no wonder that Moll Pitcher used to gain so much money from telling these men of their past and future. It is related of her that a man at one time went to her and asked her what his end would be. He was a sea captain of rather doubtful reputation and was popularly supposed to be a pirate.

"The old woman was silent for a few moments and sat smoking a long clay pipe. Suddenly she stopped and let the pipe fall to the floor. 'That,' said she to the sea captain, 'will be your fate.' It is said that some years afterward this same captain fell from a high precipice and was dashed to pieces. The moral of this story seems to be that it is never a good plan to fool around a fortune-teller if she smokes a pipe.

"Moll Pitcher certainly had an existence, as her descendants are now numbered among the first families of Lynn but perhaps another fortune-teller has quite as much of a local celebrity as Mother Pitcher has.

"This last-named person was named Debby Saco. She was an Indian by birth, and claimed to belong to the now extinct tribe of Saco Indians, from which one of the towns in Maine derives its name. Old Debby Saco used to peddle herbs on the streets, and in this way gained a great deal of information as to people's doings and whereabouts, which was a great help to her in her divinations. She had a great faculty of putting this and that together, and in this way was able to tell people things about themselves which quite astonished them. Had she lived in the present day she would have been a valuable acquistion a newspaper staff.

"The vicinity of Lynn is one of the places which is popularly supposed to be the place where Capt. Kidd, of doubtful memory, buried his treasures. Dungeon rock was the place where a man named Hiram Marble and his family dwelt for years and dug and drilled patiently being led on, as they supposed by the spirits. Unfortunately they never found anything, but they succeeded in making a good deal of money out of visitors.

Moll Pitcher's (who by the way was not the heroine of Monmouth) supposed husband used to hear all the superstitions of the time. He used to dwell with great gusto and not a little terror on a story of a company of gambling sailors who were playing with a strange dark man with a slouch hat who seemed to beat them at every turn. By and by one of the sailors looked under the table and to his horror saw that the mysterious player had a cloven foot.

"As in Lynn so in other parts of the land settled by the Puritans there remain among the old inhabitants superstitions and strange stories. In Norfolk county, which has towns whose history dates back to King Philip's war, may be found people who have told these old stories of witches and haunted houses so much that they have come to believe in them. I will remember one eccentric genius who is fond of telling the story of a house which has since borne an unsavory record and which was then inhabited by a curious man who used to be a strong indulger in New England rum, and who was generally supposed among his neighbors to be a bad character. As he lay on his death-bed it is claimed that his watchers saw the evil one drive up to the sick man's window on horseback and heard him exclaim: "Well, I guess I'll give him a day longer. I'll come back for him to-morrow night."

The devil rode away, but the following night the old man died. The same man who related this story was a soldier of the union army, and in the days of the rebellion had an experience with a man who was afterward shot for a deserter, which he was fond of relating. He said that he used to sleep beside this man, and always felt convinced that he had a cloven foot. It is quite probable that the man had simply long toenails.

"These towns which were more th[illegible]oughly countrified than New E[illegible] seaports, used to be a great res[illegible] all kinds of queer [illegible] The modern tramp is a pros[illegible] enough, but in those days the [illegible]ty included Polish refugees, Irish [illegible] Indians, queer old women, and queerer old men, as strange in bearing and manners as the mad[illegible]er mentioned by Dickens in David [Co]pperfield.' In these days the te[illegible]ance reform has swept away a [illegible] many old New England customs, [illegible] the habit of treating these tram[illegible] rum, cider, or other drinkabl[illegible] been abandoned. The stage-coa[illegible] been suppressed by the railroad, a[illegible] whole life of the New England [illegible] has, to some extent changed. The tramps were a great source of superstition especially to young people.

"These things show how much a people who can believe in such things cling to the past. The horrors of Tewksbury are worse than any that could belong to a supposed haunted house, but the people are much slower to believe in realities than in quaint stories of ghosts and goblins. A change, however, is coming to awaken to the necessity of real reform."

NEWS OF THE STATE.

Relief for Rochester—The Generous Contributions and How They Have Been Used.

ROCHESTER, Special, Oct. 10.—The total cash receipts of the Citizens' Relief committee up to date are $60,441.51. Beside this there has been received in lumber, hardware, furniture, groceries, provisions, and orders of various kinds, $6,925.73, making the total donations $67,367.24. The coal dealers of Chicago have contributed nine car loads of coal, which the Chicago & Northwestern railway has shipped from Chicago free of charge. This coal has been sold to Messrs. Whitten & Judd, and the money, about $1,200, has been placed to form a fuel fund. Large quantities of wood have been purchased in Pine Island, which the railway company agree to deliver here at less than half rates. The sum of $48,000 has been already disbursed, leaving the cash balance in the hands of the committee about $12,500. It is their intention to retain $5,000 or $6,000 to relieve the wants of such of the sufferers as are without other resources. The committee have had a gang of from twenty to seventy men, under the superintendence of A. L. Dickerman, at work, erecting dwelling houses in the devastated district. Between thirty and forty houses, at an average cost of $250, have been built by the committee alone with this force. One hundred and nineteen houses, in both city and county, have been replaced, with the assistance of the relief fund. In addition to this, an average amount of $78 has been given to each of 233 families, for the purchase of furniture and necessaries; but the aim of the committee has been, as far as possible, to expend the funds so generously contributed in permanent improvements. According to the estimate of W. C. Rice, the treasurer of the Citizen's Relief committee, from $12,000 to $15,000 worth of clothing has been distributed by the ladies, 253 families having been supplied with clothing. Those in the county who were sufferers by the first cyclone in July have also been supplied with clothing, and are included in the 253 families. Nine new cases of destitution have been relieved since the meeting of the ladies' committee on Saturday last. County Commissioner Coe and Auditor [illegible] have made a personal canvass of the county, and have based their estimates of loss on the assessors' valuation, which is less than one-half the actual value. They report the total loss at $372,000, or an actual amount of $700,000 to $800,000. An instance of the too conservatism of this estimate is shown in the following item: Upon the 19,000 acres of grain destroyed the valuation was placed at $4 per acre, or $76,000. The average of the wheat crop in the county this year is not less than eighteen bushels per acre, or a valuation of $15 instead of $4, at present low prices. A track one mile wide and thirty miles long was swept by the storm. Upon thirty-three farms not a building was left. Four hundred structures were totally wrecked and about the same number more or less damaged. Two thousand acres of timber were destroyed, which, however, will not be a total loss if the wood is properly taken care of. The relief so generously contributed will make up about 10 per cent of the actual loss to the county. The committee wish to state that the aid furnished is a most noteworthy instance of open-handed generosity, and they wish to express, through the medium of the newspapers, in behalf of the sufferers, sincere thanks for the sympathy so practically shown.

The Rochester relief fund, amounting to $67,367 all told, has been applied to its good work, with the reservation of $5,000 for sufferers who have not been assisted in any way as yet. The fund has bought furniture for 233 needy families, built between thirty and forty houses, and clothed 253 families. The total loss done by the cyclone was upwards of $1,000,000.

On the evening of the 9th inst., Assistant Chief Hildebrand of the St. Paul fire department was called from among a number of friends in the fire department headquarters and presented with an elegant gold watch. The presentation speech was made by Chief Hawkins, of the Red Wing department, who gave the watch in behalf of Chief Black, John T. Cowles of Chicago and Horace Silsby, of the Silsby Fire Engine company. Mr. Hildebrand, who was the victim of surprise, replied in a few words. Upon the inside of the watch case are inscribed in monogram the initials, "E. W. H.," and within the case are engraved the date and "Presented by the two John T.'s and H. Silsby."

The Blue Earth Valley [illegible] held at Pleasant Mound, recently, was a very successful exhibition. About 1,000 persons visited the grounds during the day. There was a large showing of blooded stock, flowers, fancy work and farm products. An address which was highly spoken of, was delivered by Gen. Baker.

The Rochester Manufacturing company, whose works were destroyed in the recent cyclone, has collected most of its scattered property, and safely housed it for the winter. The greater part of the finished machinery was but little damaged. The works will not be rebuilt this fall.

L. Kells of Sauk Center, assignee for the bankrupt lumber dealer B. B. Carney, sold the property for $4,000.

Articles of incorporation of the Northwestern Hospital for Women and Children have been filed with the secretary of state. The hospital is to be located in Minneapolis, and its purpose is to provide for women and children medical and surgical aid by regularly qualified women physicians, to obtain nurses to care for the sick, to train the young women for domestic service.

NOTICE.

At a meeting of the l'Union Canadienne of Polk County, held on Monday, Oct. 15, 1883, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the nomination of Edward Columbus of Red Lake Falls, as Clerk of the District Court, made by the Republican County Convention on Saturday, Oct. 13, 1883, be unanimously rejected; 1st, because the office will not be vacant this fall. 2d, because the French element of Polk County has no pretensions whatever to said office. 3d, because the nomination was made without and consultation whatever. It is further

Resolved, That Mr. Edward Columbus is requested by the Union to withdraw his name as a candidate to said office, and that a copy of these resolutions be sent him.

HENRY WIGHT,

The above notice, handed us for publication, appears to be a very peculiar document, dictatorial in its tone, from whose decision there seems to be no appeal, in which case it is well to inquire into it, to see whether that Society is a bigger man than the Republican party of Polk County or not. We are told that it is a French Society recently organized in this city and that its numbers are few, (but judging from its first work, we should add arrogant,) and we are also informed that the majority (if not all) of its members are Democrats. What does the critter appear to want? It seems to know more about the question of the vacancy in the office of the Clerk of the District Court than the Republican party of Polk County, or the best legal talent of our State, who have been consulted upon the question, and all of whom say that there is a vacancy in that office in Polk County this fall. Well, suppose there was no vacancy, how could the candidacy of Mr. Columbus injure this new society? If Mr. Columbus wishes to amuse himself by running for that office and the Republican party wish to have him do so, and according to the l'Canadienne Society there be no vacancy, we should think he had a perfect right to do so and no one will be injured in any way by the harmless amusement. We say IF there is no vacancy why is this society so VERY anxious to have Mr. Columbus withdraw from the contest? Again, the society assumes to speak for all of the French people, and says that the French element have no pretensions to said office. What authority has that handful of Frenchmen to speak so authoritatively for all? They further say that the nomination was made "without any consultation whatever," that is, we suppose they mean that the Republican party made their nominations without consulting the Society l'Canadienne. Why should the Republican party consult that society, or any other, before daring to exercise its right to nominate whom it chooses, independent of any society or clique? And we should like to know further upon what grounds this society presumes to call the Republican party to account for its nominations? The nomination of Mr. Columbus was urged and supported by some of the most intelligent French Republicans in our county, who say that the French element ought to be represented on the county ticket and who chose Mr. Columbus for the position recommending him very highly and urging his nomination. The only explanation of the contradictory notice we are able to give is that it is a put-up-job to benefit some man who has not the courage to face the music by coming out like a man and running for the office in a manly way, and it seems to us that the Society have been dupe into its present awkward attitude; for the true facts in the case are simply that there is a vacancy in the office of Clerk of the Court in this county this fall, and to fill that vacancy the Republican party have unanimously chosen Mr Edward Columbus, a man every way qualified and worthy to fill the office creditably and honorably, and the following communication from Mr. Columbus shows that he is not to be bluffed off of the track so easily, but that he will stick to the party who honored him with its confidence by choosing him as its candidate and no Republican need fear throwing away his vote on him. The whole business seems to be a very thin effort to get Mr. Columbus out of the way, or to give the voters the impression that he is out of the way, and to create the impression that there is no vacancy in that office this fall. That effort will miserably fail as it deserves to fail and Mr. Columbus will receive the hearty support of the Republican party this fall and be triumphantly elected.

To the Republican County Central Committee of Polk County, Minn.

GENTLEMEN:—My attention has been directed to the action of certain parties residing at Crookston who have "unanimously resolved" not to vote for me, and who seem annoyed at my candidacy for the office of Clerk of the District Court. Every citizen has a right to vote for his choice. This is conceded by all liberty loving men. The right of half a dozen men to dictate to an intelligent community is as firmly denied. Be assured, gentlemen, that my candidacy is not affected whatever by the so-called resolutions, and if the result, shall entitle me to the office for which I have been nominated, I shall endeavor to so discharge the duties connected therewith, that none will regret the choice made by the convention. You are at liberty to give such publicity to this letter as you may deem necessary.

Very respectfully,
EDWARD COLUMBUS.

Dated Lake Pleasant, Oct. 16th, 1883.

Becker County Nominations.

For Auditor the name of MR. A. S. HUNT appears. Personally we are not acquainted with that gentleman but he has the reputation of being a thoroughly capable man and one who has enough of independence to run the affairs of the office independent of the old Ring or any other man except Hunt If he is elected he will discharge his duties acceptably and creditably. For Treasurer,

HON. T. K. TORGERSON

received the unanimous nomination. This gentleman has the honor of having defeated Hamilton, of the Record thus incurring the Record's dire displeasure. Having the bitter hostility of the Record to aid him he will doubtless get a handsome majority at the polls, for the people well know that any man whom the Record opposes will not bow to the mandates of the old Ring and hence they will rally to his support. With Mr. Torgerson as treasurer and Mr. Hunt as auditor the funds of Becker County will be in good hands and beyond the control of the old Ring whose end draweth nigh. For Register of Deeds we see the name of a staunch and true old Becker County man who was unanimously nominated and who will be as unanimously elected as he is so well and favorably known that his name has become a synonym of strength. We are truly gratified to see that a former Polk County boy, has received the nomination for Sheriff, and we can say that his election to that responsible office will be a happy choice for Becker County. Mr. Norcross for several years lived at Crookston engaged in the manufacture of brick (and he made good ones too,) where he made hosts of friends by those sterling traits of character which commend him to all with whom he comes in contact. For a long time he was city marshal of Crookston, and proved a terror to evildoers, who always managed to behave themselves when "Billy Norcross" was around or else managed to keep unanimously out of his way. Mr. Norcross is an honest, capable and efficient man who, if honored with the management of the important duties of Sheriff will be a credit to the County of Becker, as he will be the best Sheriff she ever had. His opponent, J. H. Phinney has held the office of Sheriff of Becker County merely on sufferance by the Republican party. While we were in business in Becker County Mr. Phinney was a rabid Democrat and we are told that he has not changed a whit in that particular but that all of the time that he has been holding an office of trust in the Republican party he has been secretly giving aid and comfort to the enemy—been doing all he dared to aid the Democratic party. Nay more, that during the red-hot fight of last fall he was an active Kindred sympathizer and did all he could to defeat the will of the people by working hard to elect Kindred. That seems to be the kind of a "Republican (?) that J. H. Phinney is. It seems that he came before the late Republican convention of Becker County as a candidate for re-election and when the people of Becker County, in that convention assembled, said emphatically, "We don't want you!" what did he do? Why we see by the last issue of the Record that he announces himself a "candidate for the office of Sheriff and respectfully solicits the support of the voters of Becker County!" Sublime cheek! What has he ever done for the Republican party to entitle him to the "support of the Republican voters of Becker County?" A life-long Democrat, and thus a sworn enemy to the principles of that party whom he now so humbly begs to support him, he is in sympathy with that party who would grasp the Republican party of the State of Minnesota by the throat and throttle the life out of it if possible and the only reason under heaven that he will tolerate the Republican party at all is on account of the leaves and fishes What kind of a man do you call that? A man who will pocket his principles for the sake of a petty office! Compare the two men and see how they size up Mr. Norcross will be found to be a true-blue Republican every time and a man who can not be bought up; a man who can not be induced to part with principles for the sake of office and he will be a credit to the county, if elected which he doubtless will be by a good majority. For County Attorney our old-time friend is the nominee. Mr. Larson has filled that position very creditably before in Becker County and as he is so well and favorably known his election is a foregone conclusion. For Clerk of the Court was nominated. He is too well known in Becker Co., to need comment. He will go in by a handsome majorty on his merits. For Court Commissioner received the unanimous nomination which is a sufficient guarantee that he is amply qualified to discharge its duties Voters of Becker County; the above is your ticket and it is a good, solid one. A ticket that if elected will give great satisfaction. Every man upon it is a solid worker for the grand old Republican principles that are our hope and pride and not a single renegade on th ust. Look at them, work with them work for them heartily as you may and they will be triumphantly elected.

WM. A. NORCROSS

W. J. MORROW

GEO. W. TAYLOR

Bierman's Corrupt Bargains.

The little game which has apparently been concocted between Bierman and Frazee of the Minnesota Democratic state ticket, on the one hand, and Corruption Kindred of 5th district notoriety, on the other, may be interesting to them, and may seem to have in it elements of success, but it is a torpedo that will not explode, or, if it does, will only serve to blow its proprietors sky-high. The mere exposure of a piece of chicanery like that which the Tribune's St. Cloud dispatch outlines, is its destruction. No considerable number of Republican voters in the northern district are sufficiently base in purpose or obtuse of smell to walk into a trap baited with carrion. Mr. Kindred has once been before the public with his professions of ability to deliver many thousands of Republican votes to whomever he pleased. The falsity of that claim has been thoroughly demonstrated. His present proposition to deliver several thousand Republican votes to the Bourbon candidate for Governor in return for Democratic votes for himself as a bolting candidate for Congress a year hence, is unworthy of a moment's attention. This Brainerd money-bags has made one test of his ability to purchase votes by whole sale and use them in his private interest. The outcome was not such as to encourage its repetition. This episode in the current canvass is chiefly important as showing the depths to which the Democratic candidate for the highest office in the commonwealth will go to secure even the shadow of a prospect of compassing his election. Mr. Bierman's still hunt might be a great deal more secret than it is if it had not given out an odor so offensive as to attract the attention of the entire public.

We call attention to two articles in this issue taken from the Minneapolis Tribune, of Sunday, in which are given the details of a bargain between Mr. Kindred and the Democratic party. This sale does not in the least surprise us for we have for some time been cognizant that such a scheme was on foot. The Kindred leaders dare not come out openly and vote and work for Bierman and Frazee but it seems that they propose to work (on the quiet) and vote for them and then, after the election charge it up to the Norwegians. Hence their organs are now spreading the lie abroad that the Norwegians are going to vote the Bierman ticket because Bierman is a Norwegian. The fact is that the Norwegian element have got altogether too much sense to waste their votes on the Democratic nominees who have never done any thing for them (except to abuse them) and go back on their Republican friends who have done every thing for them. They know that to the Republican party they owe the generous land laws by which they can acquire a fine farm on Uncle Sam's domain, and they know too, that for every wise and beneficent law of the land of their adoption they are indebted to the Republican party, and they do not propose to aid by their votes and influence any organized attempt to overthrow the grand old Republican party even through a country man of theirs happens to be a leader of the forlorn hope. But the Kindred men think they see in this a chance to get even with the Hon. C. A. Gilman, whom they cordially hate for his efforts to sustain the Republican party last fall, by voting against him and they will say the "Norwegians did it!" Every man who voted for Mr. Kindred last fall from an honest sense of duty will repudiate the scheme to force him to vote for the Democratic ticket and we think the plotters will fail to make their little game work to any very alarming extent.

ANTI-HUBBARD ALLIANCE

Corruption Kindred Secretly Aiding Bierman in Exchange for Democratic Votes a Year Hence.

Special Telegram to the Tribune.

St. Cloud, Oct. 13.—After passing through the greater portion of the "fighting 5th" district, and conversing with leaders of both parties, I am satisfied that there is a "hen on" in the section which will be heard from on election day to Gov. Hubbard's disadvantage. Every one conversant with the facts knows that Mr. Kindred is a standing candidate for Congress, notwithstanding his overwhelming defeat a year ago, and that if he fails to secure the regular nomination next fall he will again run as a bolting candidate. Now the Democrats know they have no earthly chance of electing their own candidate to Congress in the 5th district, but they believe they have a show of electing Bierman Governor this fall. To accomplish this end the Democratic leaders in the district have entered into a compact with the Kindred leaders to vote for Kindred next fall if the followers of the latter will bolt Hubbard now. The Democrats have said to Kindred: "You know you cannot be elected without our aid. If you will help us now, we will help you a year hence. If you refuse now, we will defeat you then." And Kindred, who is eaten up with ambition, has agreed to the terms, and through his friends is quietly but effectually at work in Bierman's interest. Mark my words, more than one-half the Republicans who voted for Kindred for Congress will scratch Hubbard for Governor.

Waseca Radical: Some of our Scandinavian Republicans stand in a peculiar position as regards politics. They favor Bierman, we understand, a Democrat, for governor, and will vote for him on the ground of nationality. How will this work in the future should they come up for office on the Republican ticket, or how will it affect their prospects as aspirants for office? They will want more than their nationality vote to support them, won't they?

Svenska Folkets Tidning: A part of the Norwegian press has openly declared for Bierman. We can scarce imagine anything more reckless and shortsighted, as the Norwegians have nothing to win and everything to lose. It seems to us that our Norwegian brethren have been favored by the Republican party to a great extent; more so than have the Swedes. They have a member of congress, a State treasurer, and innumerable representatives in less important positions; but, still, they must needs have a Norwegian governor! Had there been any possibility of electing Bierman, we should refrain from charging them with stupidity, but it seems that they must understand that this election is impossible, and that they are simply destroying their future chances with the dominant party by thus chasing the splendid, but unobtainable, phantom exposed to their sight by their arch enemies.

Jackson Republic: There are 100 Norwegians in Minnesota who are better qualified for governor than A. Bierman, whom the Democrats have nominated. He is not qualified for the position by education or natural abilities. On the other hand, Gov. Hubbard, the Republican nominee, has proven himself a brave soldier in times of war, a pioneer of Minnesota who has fought to uphold the State. His past two years of service have been marked by brains, honesty, fairness and good judgment in administering the affairs of State. He is not a ringster nor a demagogue, but a worthy man, who is entitled to the votes of every Republican in Minnesota,

Albert Lea Standard: Some of our esteemed cotemporaries of the Democratic persuasion are endeavoring to awake a sudden enthusiasm within there longing breasts by hastily crowing that Bierman is going to "catch" a considerable number of Scandinavian votes, thereby admitting that Bierman was nominated principally for that very purpose. This is an insult to the Scandinavians, and is furthermore very contemptible business for this self-avowed high moral reform party. They are now Americans themselves and such a course would lower them in the respect of all the people. Our Democratic friends are shrewd, but they have shamefully overreached themselves in this case.

Duluth Times: Bierman's still hunt among his Norwegian countryman seems to be having some effect. There is an evident weakening of the Norwegians, and it is claimed they will desert Hubbard for Bierman. The fact is, Hubbard's friends can not afford to sit idly down this time, and count up majorities. The race question has entered politics, and it cuts across party lines in a way to make the old party watch carefully. Added to this is the fact that the Republican platform smacked too much of prohibition to please many Republicans, and the evident lukewarmness of the Windom faction adds another element of uncertainty. There is no reason why the Republicans of Minnesota can afford to take things easy. They will, really have to work and work hard, if they wish to maintain anything like the old time majority.

Mankato Free Press: Mr. Bierman was nominated as an experiment. A few of the leading Democrats of the State have been spoiling for years to find a plea upon which to entice the Norwegian vote, which is well known to be almost solidly Republican, over to them, and they found a man in Bierman who was willing to be made a football for these unfriendly politicans to find out what percent of Scandinavians could be led around by the nose on the beggarly nationality plea. In other words, the Democrats place the Scandinavian on a par with a drove of cattle who can be led about at the will of their master, and forced to obey the mandates of one who, in point of intelligence, has no claim of mental superiority over the masses of those whom he presumes to lead. That there are any considerable number of Scandinavians who will obey this edict is strenuously denied by many well-informed Norwegians from various parts of the State.

The Premium Engraving for "Peterson's Magazine" for 1884 has been received, and a very beautiful one it is: a picture of a mother carrying her little one up-stairs to bed, and called "Tired Out." It is a picture that will go to every mother's heart. It should be had in every family, and would make a very charming ornament for the parlor, if framed and hung up; worth, in fact, a dozen of the cheap, gaudy, vulgar chromos. It can be had, gratis, by getting up a club for "Peterson." Only the enormous circulation of the Magazine can explain why the proprietors can afford to give such premiums. "Peterson" is the best and cheapest of the lady's books, the price being but two dollars a year, with great deductions to clubs. Thus, three copies will be sent for $4.50, with this beautiful engraving as a premium. To larger clubs the inducements are even greater, including an extra copy of the Magazine, to assist in getting up clubs, are sent, gratis, if written for. Now is the time to get up clubs for 1884. Address, Charles J. Peterson, 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

The Game Laws.

The Forest and Stream, the journal of angling and shooting, published at New York, has issued a digest of the game laws of the different States. From it we take the following for this State. The dates mark the limits of the seasons in which it is lawful to kill the game named:

"Woodcock, July 4-Nov. 1; pinnated and sharptail grouse, Aug. 15-Oct. 1; quail, pheasant or partridge, Oct. 1-Jan. 1; ducks and geese, Sept. 1-May 15; deer and elk, Dec. 1-Dec. 15 (may be had in possession to Jan. 1.)

Exportation from State or possession for purpose of exportation unlawful. The Minnesota State Sportsmen's Association (W. S. Timberlake, secretary, St. Paul) offers $25 reward for information leading to conviction."

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, OCT. 18.

County News.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

By the accidental discharge of a gun on Monday last, a son of Mr. John LaBree was slightly wounded. Nothing serious however.

Mr. Mickle Anderson made us a pleasant call on Monday. Mr. Anderson is one of the foremost farmers. He has his fall plowing all done, and will now help less fortunate farmers to get their ground ready for spring,

Mr. W. F. Arnold owns a spirited team, and is justly proud of them. But knowing their disposition, he should know better than to leave them without hitching them. A neglect of this precaution resulted in a demolished buggy, and narrow escape of the team from serious injury. What little there is left of the vehicle will be taken to the shop for repairs. It is something like the old man who took a bung hole to the cooper to have a new cask buil around the hole he furnished. There is'nt much but atmosphere remaining of what was once a splendid buggy.

A little son of Mr. A. Loberg met with an accident on Sunday last, that might have been more serious, It seems that some wild geese had settled down upon the wheat stubble near the house, and the little fellow took a double barrelled gun, and went for them. An' utter ignorance of how a double gun was to be handled, lead to the discharge of both barrels at once and the same time. The result was, two dead geese and a badly bruised boy. The little chap's face is black and blue, and his head is somewhat cut, but he does not seem to mind it much, because, as he says, he killed the geese.

From the Times.

Some of the Indians appear on our streets with new hats and caps.

St. Hilaire is lively these days if the sound of hammers driving nails is any evidence.

All of our hotels and boarding houses are doing a very good business.

The railroad company is about to erect a round house here and the work has begun in earnest.

Wheat is being taken in at the elevator quite lively, and the prices paid together with the grade given, seems to give general satisfaction.

The depot is now all enclosed and the roof is on, and very soon the frisky painter will put on his finishing touches and Mr. Peas will be happy.

The Indian Chief and his son, were in town to-day getting their guns repaired for an attack on wild geese as they pass in flocks going South.

Mr. and Mrs. John Alderman are to be congratulated upon the arrival at their residence of a stranger, whom they have concluded to entertain to the best of their ability so long as he may desire to remain with them. We have been unable to learn what his full name is yet, but as he was only introducedto a few select friends in St. Hilaire yesterday morning at 5 o'clock, we can afford to wait patiently untill a formal introduction to the young gentleman is more appropriate, than it would be at this particular time.

The Burkee Brothers have been having a good trade this week with the "noble red men of the forest." The crop of snake root which they gathered in is somewhat astonishing, and Mr. Lo went his way rejoicing in a supply of tea, coffee, sugar, tobacco, calico, red handkerchiefs and the usual trinkets which go so far in making an Indian's wardrobe complete.

Judge Ives returned a few days since from his trip to Crookston by river, and having gained the desired information which induced him to take the winding course of the river down, is now fully satisfied with the knowledge thus gained. The Judge has at different times within the past year or two, embarked in exploring expeditions in various ways, until he has become probably more familiar with the vast resources and capabilities of all Northwestern Minnesota, than any other gentleman in this part of the State.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Potatoes are down to 25 cents a bushel, and are very choice in quality.

Saturday's arrivals included Messrs. McCarty and O'Brien, who returned from Red Lake by river in a birch canoe, looking hale and hearty, although they admit having got well soaked on Friday night. They are delighted with their trip.

The postoffice at Emardville is quite a convenence for the settlers of that vicinity. Mr. Emard and John Mathews have opened a grocery and general produce store there which is securing quite a trade. The Clearwater at that point furnishes a good water power which can be improved at little cost. Mr. Emard, proprietor of the town, will give good inducements to parties wishing to build mills or start business of any kind.

Mr. Pierre Emard paid us a friendly visit on Friday last, and informed us that all of the wheat in his neighborhood will over-run twenty bushels per acre No. 1 hard. The land in this vicinity (between the rivers) is all either timber or brush land, and is making the best of farms. Mr. Emard already has over one thousand bushels of potatoes harvested, and has considerable more to dig.

The brick work on the north and south wing fronts of the Kretzschmar block is completed and cornices are up, and this week will finish the center, after which only the south wall will remain, and it will probably be done before there is any hard freezing.

The big safe of the Red Lake Falls Milling & Lumber Co., arrived on Monday, and is safely installed in the Co's., office. Its enormous weight broke down the truck it was hauled on, some five miles from town, and Joe Helm will have to doctor some scratches on it.

From the Gazette.

E. M. Walsh and A. N. Hopkins of Crookston and F. E. Hunt of this city registed at the Hotel DeLaPerl Wednesday.

Last Sunday, $100 in cash was raised for the purpose of erecting a Catholic church, with $500 additional subscribed to be paid as soon as the walls of the building are erected. F. J. Detling went to St. Paul yesterday to purchase the necessary lumber, and the building will be erected at an early date.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

On last Monday, October 8, Joseph Brunell sold to Belana Brunell, the nw quarter of 35, town 153, range 50, containing 18 acres, for $2,000.

David D. Jones, the gardener, has leased for a term of four years the unsurveyed land belonging to Mrs. Julia B. Griggs, the same being situated north of Mrs. Griggs' addition, for gardening.

All day Saturday Mr. C. F. Culver was circulating around among his fellow citizens, looking as if fortune had knocked at his door and he was at home. It is a boy, and his weight is estimated all the way from eight to fifteen pounds. The mother is doing nicely.

Norman County News.

From the Index.

S. A. Farnsworth was down from Crookston Saturday on business.

The splendid weather we have enjoyed ought to prevent the damaging of any grain this fall.

The many friends of J. S. Johnson will be pleased to hear that he is improving, although slowly.

The threshers leave all their patrons contented this fall, since they always leave them from 20 to 25 per cent. more grain than was expected.

One of our large farmers raked all over his grain fields, after stacking, with the result of saving 200 bushels of wheat. This is a good example for our farmers to follow.

Mr. Manvel has made arrangements whereby farmers living along the line of the Moorhead Northern road can ship their wheat direct to Duluth if they so desire. This will be a very welcome announcement to the farmers, as it gives them a choice of market.

The Hon Knute Nelson will address the citizens of Crookston and vicinity, upon the political issues of the day on Tuesday evening, Oct., 30th 1883. There should be a good turnout to give our Congressman a rousing welcome.

SAWDUST FROM RED LAKE.

Grand Forks Daily Herald.

Mayor McCormack returned yesterday from a tour of inspection to the Red Lake Pine lands. He went with a view to investigate the chances for obtaining logs in case a large saw mill is established at this point,

A Herald reporter called at his residence last evening and in an interview on the subject the mayor said in substance as follows:

"I visited the Red Lake Reservation and find that the supply of pine exceeds my most sanguine expectations. There are millions of logs obtainable at a price which amply justify the people of Grand Forks to build a mill for the manufacture of lumber. I was within six miles of Mr. Walker's drive, which is on Clearwater River, and at its present low stateit is impossible to drive logs The only time that Walker can drive his logs is when the water is high. I find I can get abundance of logs on a stream that empties into Red Lake, and even in the present low stage of the water logs can be driven there with the utmost facility. In speaking of Mr. Walker's mill in Crookston the mayor said: I observed as I passed through Crookston that Mr. Walker has made extensive excavations on the east bank of the Red Lake River, and is pushing the work of erecting his large mill with the utmost vigor. He has sixty men at work and a steam pile driver. A side track has been laid by the Manitoba road to the site of the mill, to a facilitate the delivery of the material for construction. The citizens of Crookston gave Mr. Walker twenty acres of land and $20,000 bonus.

"This," said Mr. McCormack, "is the mill that should have been in Grand Forks. Our people had the first chance and allowed it to slip from their grasp. Crookston has certainly got to the windward of us in this case, but there will be more mills constructed here, for no one mill can begin to make an impression on the vast forests of pine which I look upon as the greatest source of wealth and power that lies at our doors."

Mr. McCormack said that unless the people of the city build a mill, they "like the base Indian, will throw a pearl away richer than all his tribe." If they do not wish to furnish him a bonus, then he is willing to form a stock company and allow any one to control it the company may desire. A mill is a vital necessity, and on this hinges the prosperity of Grand Forks.

Morgan's Libel Suit.

The suit of Keefe vs Henry Morgan, with an attachment on his church and dwellings for $25,000 is put down for the October term, Superior Court, Suffolk County, Boston. The plaintiff claims to be the identical "Rose" and "Rose Delaney," heroine of "Boston Inside Out," who, it is alleged, by her own confession and by the written statements of her husband, was induced to leave the path of rectitude by "Father Titus," a noted ecclesiastic, and at one time acting prelate. The defence claims that "Rose Delaney" is fictitious character; that he recognizes no such personage as Keefe. If there is any resemblance, it was furnished by the husband of the plaintiff when both were living together in sweet harmony and conjugal concord. At first it was supposed that leading Catholics were backing the suit against Mr. Morgan, but, upon learning that $2,500 had already been paid the harmonious couple by the priest for their wounded feelings, besides $300 to the lawyers on either side for hushing the slander suit, then the zealous Catholic defenders of the priesthood were thunderstruck, non est inventus. If the suit comes to trial, as it probably will, it must reveal the curse of celibacy and the general immorality of the priesthood of the Roman Catholic Church, as they never have been revealed in Boston or in America. Agents, send $1.00 for sample copy of "Fallen Priest" or for "Boston Inside Out" (25th edition) to "Rev. Henry Morgan, 81 Shawmut Avenue, Boston, Mass." Retail price $1.50.

REPUBLICAN COUNTY TICKET.

For Clerk of the District Court,
EDWARD A. COLUMBUS.
For County Superintendent of Schools,
V. D. CARRUTH.

The St. Paul Dispatch has the following good words to say for our candidate for Governor,

LUCIUS F. HUBBARD.

The private and official record of the Republican candidate for Governor, Gen. Lucius F. Hubbard, of Goodhue County, cannot be too often called to mind, in asserting his claims to the continued confidence and support of the people of Minnesota. He comes before them, as the nominee of his party for re-election, with all the long and honorable career behind him on which he was so triumphantly elected two years ago, and with an added record of distinguished and acceptable service in the exalted position to which he was then chosen. Gen. Hubbard was born in 1836, at Troy, N. Y. In 154 he completed learning the trade of tinsmith at Salem, N. Y., when he removed to Chicago, where he remained three years. He then removed to Red Wing, in this State, where he started the Red Wing Republican. In the fall of 1858 Gen. Hubbard was elected register of deeds for Goodhue County, and held the office until the close of his term in 1860. At the breaking out of the rebellion he responded to his country's call and enlisted as a private in the fifth Minnesota, and achieved the distinction of being successively promoted until he reached the high rank of brigadier general. After the war he returned to Red Wing and entered into the grain and milling business on an extensive scale. In 1868 Gen. Hubbard was nominated for Congress by the Republican convention for the second district at St. Paul over W. D. Washburn and C. C. Andrews, Mr. Donnelly's friends having withdrawn from the convention. A question as to the regularity of the nomination having arisen, Gen. Hubbard declined the nomination; refusing the doubtful honor. In 1872, Gen. Hubbard was elected to the State Senate from Goodhue County, and re-elected in 1874, thus serving for four years. During these terms he occupied a prominent and influential position among the exceptionally able array of men who composed that body. He held a high place on leading committees—especially on those to investigate the affairs of the State Auditor's and State Treasurer's offices, wherein he displayed a firm purpose to deal justly by the accused, while firmly protecting the interests of the State, and joined in the recommendations for and in shaping the legislation which worked such marked reforms in those offices. After the expiration of his senatorial term, Gen. Hubbard, having declined a re-election, devoted himself to his private business. In 1881, Gen. Hubbard was nominated as the Republican candidate for Governor. The Democrats nominated Gen. R. W. Johnson of St. Paul, one of the most popular Democrats in the State, as his opponent; and at the election in November the result was as follows:

Hubbard,	65,025
Johnson,	37,168
Hubbard's majority	27,857

This was the largest majority ever given in the State for a gubernatorial candidate. Gov. Hubbard received nearly 64 per cent. of all the votes cast, which was the largest percentage given to any candidate since the organization of the State, even including the Presidential years. Gov. Hubbard entered upon the discharge of his duties of office January 10th, 1882, and has since performed them with such dignity, integrity and manifest purity of purpose as to fully vindicate the wisdom of those who originally gave him their support, as well as to command the esteem and confidence of all the people, regardless of party affiliations. He has been cool, careful, conservative, [illegible] have been based on a judicious, independent and intelligent consideration of all the bearings of the case. No man controls him or dares assume to dictate his course. He is a patient, courteous listener to all the arguments of all the advocates on all sides of controverted questions, and then makes his own decisions, firmly and finally. No one has ever accused him of improper motives or influences,—and his errors of judgment, if any, cannot be attributed to a lack of due deliberation. In short, he has made a safe, honest, and popular Governor. His official record, like his private character, is without a blemish or a stain and gave him such popularity that he was unanimously renominated for re-election. That renomination was everywhere demanded, in advance, by the sentiment of the party and the people he had served so well. It was everywhere endorsed and approved by the press and the people of the commonwealth. And in the campaign which has followed it is an unprecedented as it is a most creditable fact, that no one voice has been raised even by his political opponents to assail his character, to question his motives or to impeach his record. On this impregnable foundation does his candidacy rest—and thereon may our assurance of his triumph be confidently built.

THE SWEDISH PRESS.

It Predicts a Rousing Victory for Hubbard.

The Budstikken the only Deserter from the Ranks in Minnesota—The Norwegian Impeachment Case.

From the Farmers' Tribune.

The Scandinavian journals of Minnesota issued the past week contain no specially notable expression of opinion.

THE NORDVESTEN

thinks it rather unjust that the Democratic papers, in endeavoring to persuade Scandinavians to vote for Bierman, hold that 'we will prove ourselves to be what we often have been called, 'voting cattle,' if we now, when we have a chance to show our importance, politically speaking, desert our friend Bierman, and blindly follow our political leaders." "Now, it happens continues the Nordvesten, that papers supporting the Republican ticket in full, use the same argument in case we vote for Bierman, merely on account of his nationality. We take this occasion to remind our native fellow-citizens that the quiet, hard-working race that has contributed so much to develop the wilds and prairies of the West, are endowed with perhaps as much true love of liberty and self-respect as Americans themselves. This kind argumentation, forever and ever returning at the least provocation, is not calculated to carry with it conviction at any rate. Such arguments, we call them slurs, may prove effective on some people, but we would suggest that with us they have not the desired effect. In this connection let us remark that this paper always has been, and will continue to be a Republican paper. We are Republicans and shall continue as such as long as our party, as heretofore has been the case, conducts affairs so as to promote the welfare of the people."

THE NORDEN

predicts that Gen. Hubbard will be elected with a rousing majority, notwithstanding that his oponent is a Scandinavian. Most Republicans think he is entitled to a second term and especially since at the last election he was a very popular candidate. There can be no reason in voting for his opponent just because this opponent happens to be a Norwegian. Bierman has had no chance to prove himself capable to fill such a a prominent position as that of Governor of Minnesota. Gen. Hubbard's qualifications are known and he is a Republican. Bierman's qualifications are not known and he is a Democrat.

THE FERGUS FALLS UGEBLAD

announced that Hon. K. Nelson has, at the request of the Repulican central committee, promised to take the stump for the Rupublican ticket. This refutes the statement made by organs of Kindred to the effect that Nelson had left the State to avoid taking any part in the campaign.

THE FOLKBLADET

openly charges the Scandinavian papers that have taken up Bierman's standard, with working in the interests of saloons and liquor venders, as the Democratic party is in favor of free whisky.

THE SVENSKA FOLKETS TIDNING

says: "It is with real satisfaction that we to-day announce to our readers that the majority of the Norwegian press in the West have declared for Hubbard and the entire Republican ticket in Minnesota. For some time it really looked as if our brethren had become infatuated with the glowing prospect of electing a Norwegian Governor, but fortunately upon second thought they seemed to have come forth squarely on the side of the old party. All the older, larger and more influential Norwegian papers have been heard from. No generally known and read paper with the exception of 'Budstikken,' has had the face to advise its readers to vote for Bierman, and thus to act against their better convictions, simply because their political opponents have been smart enough to nominate a Norwegian for Governor. Still, it cannot do any great amount of harm, that 'Budstikken' supports the Democratic candidate, as this paper has long been known to have no political creed. The public will surely recollect that only a few years ago it [illegible] in a congressional campaign. Its work did not effect that gentleman, neither will 'Budstikken' elect Bierman."

Minnesota Tribune: As it is important to every worthy and high interest [illegible] nation at large should be continued, so [illegible] Minnesota the Republican party should maintain an unbroken front, and should at the approaching election send out to Republicans in other states such an emphatic greeting as will furnish an inspiration to comfort and the assurance of victory in the greater struggle of 1884. The Republicans of Minnesota can afford to let bygones be bygones in the near presence of a presidential contest. In that approaching contest that stake is too great and the results too far reaching to permit a thought of endangering the outcome by magnifying local differences which are already a thing of the past. The Democratic party seems likely to enter the national canvass with whatever of prestige comes from carrying a number of doubtful states the present year. This fact renders it additionally important that those commonwealths which are unquestionably Republican should hold their own and thus contribute strength instead of weakness to the Republican side in the general engagement. Republicans should stand by their party this year, not only on account of what the party has done, but because of what it has yet to do as the cleanest most progressive and most hopeful political force on the American continent.

The Smut Racket.

Aitkin Age.

Now it is smut that the millers and elevator men have discovered to be the matter with the wheat. In former years in has been light weight, dampness, soft wheat, sprouted kernels, foul seeds, mustiness, or being cut with wire binders. For each of these fancied or real objections a liberal reduction in price and a heavy reduction in weight has been insisted on and enforced. This year all these "rackets" were played out. The wheat is plump, heavy, bright, free from foul seeds, and was harvested and secured in the best of weather, and was cut with twine binders. It was generally thought that the wheat handlers would take it for what it really seemed to be, No. 1 hard. But the long headed millers of Minneapolis, and the entire clique who get their living by handling the staple of the Northwest were not so easily frustrated, so the cry of smut was raised. This terrible (?) fungus had been discovered in the wheat, and the entire crop was nearly worthless. But the kindhearted wheat buyers would not entirely refuse the wheat. They would take it from the farmers even though they lost by the operation. By reducing the grade and throwing off a few pounds per bushel they think they might take the wheat and come out without great loss to themselves. And this cry of smut will be kept up until the bulk of the crop is marketed.—Litchfield Independent.

Yes, that is just the kind of hairpins the Millers Association of Minneapolis are. They consider the wheat farmer of the Northwest their especial plunder and they propose to plunder him unmercifully. If they hear of his selling a bushel to any one else they rise en-mass, lay aside all personal differences and proceed to crush their competitor.

The American Agriculturist For November

surpasses in every respect any previous issue of that periodical during its forty-three years of existence. It contains over one hundred illustrations, engraved expressly for its columns, by Halm, Cary, Forbes, Trumble, Reed, and other well-known artists. There are four full-page engravings, including the cover, which is a greater number than has ever appeared before in a single issue of the American Agriculturist. There are over one hundred columns of reading matter, upon all subjects pertaining to the Farm, Garden, and Household, by such well-known writers as Orange Judd, Joseph Harris, George Thurber, Byron D. Halsted, William Clift, Alfred Trumble, Prof. S. R. Thompson, R. W. Seiss, F. D. Curtis, A. H. Allen, M. C. Weld, and a host of others. There are papers on every variety of subject, covering the entire country from Maine to California, and from Canada to the Gulf. Among the leading features of the paper are several fully illustrated articles on Barn Plans and Outbuildings, remodelling barns, etc. The article on "Cattle Ranching" in South America is fresh and very interesting. David W. Judd contributes an article on "Prairie Chicken Shooting," illustrating with a full-page engraving. Price, post-paid, $1.50 a year.

DEFAULT HAS BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of three hundred and thirty-nine 88-100 dollars which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage executed and delivered by Daniel Shutt and Mary Shutt, his wife, to Mary P. Mixer, bearing date the fifteenth day of May, A. D 1882, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of Register of Deeds of the County of Polk, in the State of Minnesota, on the seventeenth day of May A. The Red Lake River Boom and Water-power Co., held another meeting in Ives & Hattlestad's office on Monday evening. Several more shares of stock were subscribed for and there is still about 150 shares to be taken. The city of Crookston ought to take every dollar of that stock and thus secure absolute control of this valuable property.

Great excitement prevails over the alleged discovery of gold in paying quantities, at Lisbon, D. T., 55 miles from Fargo. If half we hear is true it will cause the biggest kind of a rush to that country and the farmers of the valley will have to feed the crowd which means good prices for all we have to sell. This means gold in the wheat roots.

Carpets and oil cloth at cost. New York Store.

In company with Hon. Paul C. Sletten we took a trip to St. Hilaire on Saturday last, returning on Monday. We put up with those jolly landlords, Neer and Wheelden and after having duly sampled their "bed and board" are prepared to recommend them to all who sojourn for a time in the thriving city of St. Hilaire. We were truly surprised to see so large a place which has sprung up in a short time and we actually believe that we saw white flags, denoting laid out lots fully three miles from the depot. The town has a fine future before it, we were told and we have no reason to doubt it. Judge F. Ives told us that he is making no efforts this fall to sell lots and should not do much before next spring. We took a stroll over the Crocker, Cundy & Nelson addition which is a beautiful plat nicely laid out and the proprieters are on the watch for the boom next spring. St. Hilaire has church services and on Sabbath evening we were permitted to listen to an eloquent sermon preached by the Rev. W. C. Beebe, a young Presbyterian minister who is doing a good work up there. What we saw convinced us that St. Hilaire has a fine country, an enterprising wide-awake population and a grand future. Politically we did not find much opposition to Governor Hubbard and we believe that the straight Republican State and county ticket will poll about all of the votes.

Mr. Peter O. Berg of Lowell, has bought Jake Warninger's trotter.

Dont forget the duty you owe to your country on election day. Let nothing prevent your voting.

Boss Hinman, the carpenter and builder, has rented the Central house and will take possession about November 1st.

Mayor Stuart's new residence is ready for the putty-coat. When completed the mayor will have an elegant residence.

Mr. Collins, of the firm of Terry & Collins, is on the sick list. His parents have come from Bellevue, Iowa, to care for him.

Don't forget Nelson's speech next Tuesday evening. Turn out and hear some sound political doctrines discussed by an able man.

If you enjoy a good cigar go to the cigar store of Peter Reub & Co., on Broadway, and sample some cigars made in Crookston.

An amateur dramatic society has been formed in our city and will be "Above the Clouds" to a Crookston audience a few weeks hence.

We have received an invitation to attend the first annual ball of New Era Lodge, No. 76. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, to be given at Fergus Falls Nov. 7th.

Owing to the large increase in immigration last week the JOURNAL omitted to notice the advent a little stranger at Prof. Thompson's. Who says this is not a healthy country?

The Red Lake Times has turned up its toes to the daisies. We suspected as soon as we saw the Stordock article in the Times that that dose would prove more ballast than the Times could carry.

Sheriff Zwickey started last night for Winnipeg with the forger, Marcellus who has been in prison here a few days awaiting extradition. The prisoner signified his willingness to go back, so he was taken.

The sale of carriages and buggies on Monday was very poorly attended showing that farmers are too busy plowing, threshing and attending to their fall's work to attend to anything else. The buggies will be stored and kept for the spring trade.

The Lee & Herrick Roller mills are now running daily, grinding out a superior quality of flour. When this mill comes down to grinding night and day, as it soon will it can use up 1,000 bushels of wheat per day. Sampson's mill will soon be at work and that will take another thousand. Day begins to dawn and the time is not far distant when the octopus grip of the Minneapolis Millers' Association upon this country will relax.

Wm. Marin on Tuesday last finished threshing 240 acres on the JOURNAL farm with a 40 inch cylinder Massillon machine in three days time. The yield of grain was materially affected by the drouth. One piece of barly, five acres, that had received extra cultivatian yielded 60 bushels per acre; the wheat averaged 19 bushels and the oats were too poor to mention being not over 35 bushels per acre. The Massillon, a straw-burner, is a rattler and men can not go to sleep or tell very long stories while she is humming. We can recommend it very highly.

And now it is our milkman who is rejoicing in the arrival of a new son and heir. The JOURNAL humbly considers itself endorsed and rejoices to see its prophecies being fulfilled. It will be remembered that the JOURNAL urged in favor of the building of the Walker saw mill here that it would be the means of increasing our population several thousands. The foundations of that great mill are scarcely laid and we have already chronicled several hundred increase (more or less.) If we get a few more mills we may reasonably expect a city of 20,000 in the near future.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

AN AFFAIR OF HONOR.

The hot rays of a July sun came down with uncomfortable intensity upon the glaring white sand of the beach, as a somewhat flashily attired young man shielded himself with an umbrella, and watched the more active specimens of humanity disporting themselves in the brine, which was tossed rather tumultuously by a strong southerly breeze.

"By gracious!" he muttered at length, "That girl in the blue bathing suit had better be a little more careful; she'll get beyond her depth."

And he took a few steps nearer to the bathers—mostly females, one of whom, a little distance from the rest, seemed decidedly venturesome, the receding waves forming a dangerous undertow.

"There!—I thought so!" he cried flinging away his umbrella and dashing across the narrow strip of sand, as a cry of alarm rose up from the water and a blue clad form disappeared from sight, drawn under by the backward rush of the waves.

He met the next incoming wave, but succeeded in getting beyond it, as a white face appeared in sight and a pair of plump arms were held despairingly toward him.

He was a strong swimmer, and, spite of his clothing, which impeded him somewhat, managed to reach and grasped the imperiled maiden ere the saline waters closed over her again.

His heart throbbed, as her arms clutched about his neck, and it seemed altogether probable that they would perish together; but he broke from her clinging grasp, in a measure, and battled manfully with the turbulent element so successfully that the next breaker landed them, breathless and exhausted, upon the beach—in a safe position, if not a graceful one.

"You should keep within the protection of the life-lines," enjoined the rescuer, as he assisted the half-strangled damsel to her feet.

And a moment after she disappeared in a bathing house, leaving him to cast rueful glances at his ruined clothing, and wonder who the pretty girl was whom he had saved.

And then he realized that he was bareheaded, his hat having disappeared in the hungry maw of the waters, that rolled and tumbled, as though seeking more substantial victims.

In an incredibly short space of time the door of the little box opened again, and a bewildering vision of lovliness burst upon him, and in place of the frantic, terror-stricken girl of a few moments before, he beheld a stylishly-dressed young lady, her amber-brown eyes shining with mirth and her face rimpling with smiles, tripping daintily toward him.

"I am exceedingly grateful," she said, in a clear, low voice, "and feel that I must apologize for being the source of so much inconvenience to you. I had no thought that the water had such power"—and she drew her pretty shoulders with a slight shiver, as she gazed seaward at the incoming waves.

"Oh—I—please don't mention it," stammered the young man, who was little used to ladies' society, bowing his hatless head and fumbling in his breast-pocket, from which he drew a piece of drenched pasteboard, upon which she could decipher:

"P. Filmore,
"Boston, Mass."

"I am from the "Hub," myself," she said, laughingly, her white teeth gleaming between her ripe-red lips; and her shapely hand drew forth a tiny card-case, from which she abstracted a dainty bit of enameled bristol-board bearing the legend:

"Miss Olive Orrington,
"Ellington Avenue, Boston."

The heart beneath Peter Filmore's saturated vest gave a quick throb as he glanced at the card and recognized the aristocratic locality in which she lived.

"I hope, Miss Orrington, you will receive no ill effects from your immersion."

And then he stopped, confusedly, as a silver laugh rippled from her full lips.

"Excuse, but there is little danger of that, as I was already in the water; but I fear most disastrous consequences would have ensued but for your timely assistance. You are the one who have suffered," and she looked commiseratively at his drenched attire and uncovered head.

"Never mind that," he said, picking up his umbrella, which had been rolling about on the sand. "I can shelter my defenceless head with this, and I have other hats at the house where I am stopping. Have you friends here?"

"Not any," she returned. "I am stopping at the hotel yonder."

"And I am boarding at a private house just over the hill," he answered, as she stopped and looked inquiringly at him, "and I consider myself very fortunate in making your acquaintance, even under such adverse circumstances."

It was the most grandiloquent speech he had ever made, but he felt amply repaid by the bright smile with which she rewarded him, and as he sat in his boarding-house that evening a nameless thrill pervaded his being to which he had heretofore been a stranger. It had been the custom of Peter Filmore for a number of years to throw aside the duties of life once in the 12 months, and for a few weeks at least to be a gentleman of leisure. His occupation was the hard and rather unromantic one of blacksmith and carriage-ironer; but he possessed a soul above that of the common Vulcan, and when the summer days grew warm and balmy, the leathern apron was cast aside, and behold the grub was a butterfly. The savings of a year were generally consumed in these annual recreations, and when they terminated he would go penniless back to the shop and patiently smite the glowing iron and await the next respite from slavery.

But this night a new impulse was creeping into his brain, and another more commendable had found lodgement in his heart. The latter feeling was admiration for the fair young girl whom he had rescued, and it warmed and glowed and lighted up his honest, not-unhandsome face, as he thought of her smiling graciousness and apparent obliviousness to the fact that he was only a hard-handed son of toil. And this thought only helped to augment the other, for something seemed to be whispering to him that if he could win the heart of this confiding maiden, he might thereby lift himself above the necessity of earning his bread by the sweat of his brow.

All through the night these thoughts haunted him, and visions of plump, white arms, a fair, frightened face, framed in the whirling waters of an angry sea, a dainty, trim maiden, with dewy lips and a mischievous glint in her bright eyes, thronged in upon his fitful slumbers, and the next afternoon he dresses himself in his "other" best suit, for his wardrobe was not exceedingly ample and strolled down upon the beach.

Miss Orrington was there, and greeted him with childlike frankness.

"I have been looking for you," she said, naively, as she gave him her hand, and poor Peter was vanquished completely as the strong, yet gentle clasp of her fingers closed upon his.

"I shall not venture into the water to-day," said the lady, as they sauntered along the sand and watched the antics of the bathers. "My nerves were a trifle unstrung yesterday."

She did not look at all disturbed, and when they parted Peter Filmore felt that he was a doomed man, for he well knew that, under ordinary circumstances, his case was as hopeless as it could well be. How gracious, and sweet and smiling she was, and how different a creature a city belle from what he had imagined! Her laugh had such a wholesome, hearty ring in it, and she was so unaffected in her manner, while in years, she could scarcely, as yet, have exceeded her twentieth.

Again that night he sat as he did the evening before and wrestled with himself. At one moment her evident pleasure in his company lifted him to the highest pinnacle of happiness, and then he would be plunged in the deepest abyss of misery as a dingy blacksmith shop, with its glowing forge and heavy drudgery, rose up before him and seemed to stand between himself and the smiling object of his newly awakened adoration.

The place where he had met his fate was a rather secluded seaside resort in eastern New England, and as he joined in the company of Miss Orrington day after day, he determined to win her, if possible, let the circumstances be what they would.

He had developed of late a wonderful liking for feminine society, and surprised himself at the ease with which he glided into the ways of the hitherto charmed circle; for though he was a novice in such matters, he was fairly well read and above the average in intelligence.

So one evening late in July, as the sea lay like a huge mirror in the soft radiance of the silver moonlight, he dropped the oars which he had been plying with unusual vigor, and allowed the boat to drift over the glassy surface, unruffled by the slightest symptom of a breeze.

His companion was looking dreamily towards the shore from which the strains of music and sounds of laughter floated like echoes from fairyland.

"Isn't this delicious," said Miss Orrington, turning her radiant face toward him. "It seems as though I could live my life out in such a state of beatitude as this."

A strong arm seemed to grasp the throat of the young man.

"It is heaven on earth," he answered, in a low, almost hoarse tone.

The strange sound of his voice startled her.

"Are you sick?" she said, reaching her hand toward him from the seat in the stern of the little boat. "Your voice sounds so strangely."

"No, I am very well indeed," he returned, with an effort; "but I was thinking how soon these pleasant days must end."

The oppressed feeling came suddenly upon her, and her rosy cheeks paled in the moonlight.

"I had never thought of that," she faltered.

"It seems as though we had known each other a lifetime!"

And the look in her face made him forget everything; and, at the risk of capsizing the frail craft, he threw himself on his knees before her, and clasped her hand, which he devoured with kisses; while the stern of the boat sank deep in tranquil water, which splashed in over the side, and brought him to his senses somewhat.

"Don't you know how much I have loved you, Miss Orrington?" he whispered, passionately, as though fearful that prying ears might hear him, spite of the seclusion of the waters, and her low answer assured him that his passion was returned.

And hour after hour passed heedlessly by, and the moon cast many an admonishing glance backwards at them as she retired behind the hill-tops, ere they realized the lateness of the hour, and the happy Peter, who envied not the angels, once more seized the oars and pulled his precious freight shoreward.

But the reaction came as soon as he once more sought his pillow, and he moaned in agony as he thought of the cruel gulf that lay between himself and the girl whom he worshiped; for the thought of bettering himself by the alliance had all given place to the one engrossing idea of possessing her.

One device and another was hit upon and thrown aside as impracticable, and when morning came he seemed no nearer to a solution than before; but during the day he conjured up a pathway out of the dilemma, which, though not honorable, he felt assured would at least bring matters to a crisis.

That evening he told her a story of how his parents were set upon his marrying a girl for whom he never entertained the slightest affection, and then, as his well-nigh hopeless love added fervor to his words, he urged her to marry him immediately, so that this question might be settled beyond all dispute; and the girl trembling with emotion, to his indefinite delight consented.

Their arrangements were of the simplest possible character, and 24 hours afterward the guests assembled at the hotel parlor to witness the impromptu marriage, though all day long a horror of what he was doing had been creeping over Peter Filmore, chilling his heart and paling his usually ruddy cheek.

And now, as the hour drew near, and he went to meet the guileless, confiding girl, he felt more like a condemned felon going to his execution, than a prospective bridegroom.

Miss Orrington met him with downcast eyes and flushed cheek, and her hand trembling as she placed it in his.

His eyes devoured her hungrily. He noted her dimpled shoulders that gleamed like ivory above the dainty muslin dress she wore, with the knots of flowers and simple adornments that so enhanced her beauty, for no jewels shone upon her fair person; and then, at the last moment, his manhood asserted, itself and he begged a moment's conversation with her.

A look of horror gleamed in the brown eyes of the girl as they stood alone in the side-room. She seemed almost fainting, and grasped a chair for support as he turned toward her, with set lips and the impress of death upon his face.

"Miss Orrington, I can not marry you!" came from his pallid lips, low, yet distinct, and then he stopped, while the deceived girl sank into the chair and sobbed piteously.

"I would have made you a good wife," she moaned, as Peter gasped for breath and tottered back and forth before her.

"But I am only a blacksmith and have nothing but my trade to depend upon. It would take nearly my last dollar to pay the clergyman," he said, at length, pausing before the weeping girl, "and I can not wed one so far above me!"

Miss Orrington sprang to her feet and bounded forward. Her arms were around his neck, her tear-bedewed face was pressed to his, while the words she uttered seemed to come from the depths of her tender girlish heart:

"Oh, Peter, Peter! I am so glad! I am nothing but a lady's maid, and I thought I would try this summer to do as my mistress does; but if we love each other what do we care for money? I thought you were going to cast me off because of my poverty!"

Never a happier bridegroom than Peter Filmore led his blushing bride to the altar, albeit the guests had become somewhat impatient at the delay; and the honest blacksmith is as proud of his tidy home and pretty wife as ever was a prince of his gorgeous palace and bejeweled consort.

AN AMERICAN BEAUTY.

Miss Jennie Chamberlain's Family and Its Connections.

From a Cleveland Letter.

Mr. William S. Chamberlain, the father of the young American lady whose beauty has won such publicity for her in London social circles, is a member of the well-known Chamberlain family of Cleveland, and a nephew of the millionaire Selah Chamberlian, who so long held $1,000,000 worth of valueless Minnesota bonds, and finally had them redeemed by the state at about half their face value. But it was not from the Chamberlain side that the money came upon which the present social distinction in England is maintained. Mrs. Chamberlain is the only daughter of the late Judge Hiram V. Wilson, and was his heiress. Wilson was one of the ablest and most soild of Cleveland's solid men of twenty years ago, being made by President Buchanan the first Judge of the United States Circuit and District Court for the District of Northern Ohio, and holding his position until death released him in the first term of President Lincoln. His successor was Judge Charles Sherman, a brother of the Senator.

Judge Wilson owned a very extensive tract of land lying along what is now Wilson avenue, one of the main thoroughfares of the eastern section of the city. When the purchase was made the price was very low, but lately sections of it have been sold for over $10,000 an acre. It was from this piece of land that Kennard, the Englishman who made so great a display during the early days of the old Atlantic and Great Western Railway, purchased a tract where the High School building now stands, with the purpose of building a magnificent residence; but after one load of stone had been hauled for its foundation and before earth could be broken some of his many difficulties came upon him and it passed into other hands.

In 1861 or 1862 Mr. Chamberlain, who was a lawyer, and afterwards a Quartermaster under Gen. Hazen, in the 41st Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, was married to Mary, the only daughter of Judge Wilson. Two children were born to them, one of whom is married to George Wick of Youngstown, and the other, Jennie, is the young lady who has won such marked attention from the Prince of Wales, and consequently from all the fashionable personages of England and their resident American imitators. The young lady has been away from home for so large a portion of her life that she is little known to the great mass of Cleavelanders, although there are a few who know her intimately and have kept up their acquaintance since her departure.

One of her schoolmates, in speaking of the young lady, said: "Of course it would be foolish for me to declare that in her early girlhood anyone marked her as the foundation for ever so much of a distinguished career as that of a fashionable beauty, but I can remember that she was noted even in those days for her beauty. She was a very delicate blonde, not stamped with any prominent intellectual marks, but possessing winning features. She was a great deal prettier than the average. She was always seen with her mother and they all lived quietly and apparently very happily in the old homestead on Wilson avenue. The young lady was never an attendant on the public schools, but received her education in Paris."

WORK OF DETECTIVES.

Why it Often Fails—Some Notable Failures.

Washington Star.

An old and experienced detective in the employ of the government, an educated gentleman, and one who has worked not only in this country, but in Europe, commenting upon the Rose Clark murder mystery, expresses the opinion that the detectives now working up the case were all wrong in their theories, and that no satisfactory results would be obtained. "People," says he "complain that the modern detective is not as good as the average detective of past generations, but I believe they are just as good as they ever were. The trouble is that the average detective is, and always has been, a man of little education, and, compared with his fellow-citizens generally, a very ignorant man. But with the advancement of science and the spread of general intelligence among the masses, the criminal has become more scientific and more intelligent in his work. I was struck with a remark which Billy Forrester, the man supposed for a long time to be the perpetrator of the celebrated Nathan murder, once made to me, "There have been," said he, "rewards amounting to $500,000 offered for my capture. I have known of at least 300 detectives who were looking for me in this country and Europe. While they were dyeing their mustaches I generally left the city. The trouble is that nearly every detective does his work after a system. There is a set way for the tracing up of every crime, and when the average detective has followed up every trail suggested by the usual rules for working up a certain class of crimes, he is unable to go any farther and the criminal goes undiscovered." Why, there's Josh Taggert of Philadelphia, who jumped enthusiastically into the Charlie Ross case, and spent first $10,000 of his own money and $8,000 more that he borrowed, and then died. Then there is Capt. Jourdan, who spent his wealth looking for Forrester, of whom I just spoke, and then, he, too, died. These men, stimulated by the reward offered, tried the old systems in working up their cases and failed, because the men they were looking for were too intelligent and outwitted their pursuers. The science of safe building has developed to such an extent that the old style safe burglary is a lost art. There will be bank robberies in the future, but no bank burglaries; counterfeiting, too, is carried on only by a few amateurs. The old-timers among the counterfeiters turn their attention to other swindles, where the outlay is small and the risk not so great. Ask a business man how long it has been since he saw a counterfeit note. Ask your banker the same question. If a counterfeit comes out it is generally better executed than the genuine, and it is detected because it is good work, rather than because it is poor. To do detective work a man must be of mature age, and must disipline himself against arriving at conclusions too quickly. I have a general idea from closely reading the newspaper accounts of the Rose Clark murder, that it was not a deliberately planned aff ir. I think the murderer's object was at first, when he probably came unexpectedly upon the woman in the darkness, that he might overpower her and gratify a base passion; but, finding he had used too much violence; he made good the work of murder when once he saw he had gone too far, and threw the body where it was found. The vanishing of the theories of the detectives shows that they are all upon the wrong track."

FORTY BILLION GERMS.

A Wonderful Theory That Concerns the Welfare, Happiness and Life of Everyone.

In his quiet and cosy library at the close of a busy day sat a gentleman and his wife, he absorbed in a new book and she in the newspaper. Quickly glancing toward her husband, she asked, at a certain point in the article.

"John, what is the germ theory?"

"The germ theory—well—yes; just look in the encyclopedia under 'Germ,' that will explain it so much better than I can."

Accordingly his wife opened the book at the word named and read: Germ Theory of Disease—A theory advanced by the ablest and best investigators and scientists of the times. It supposes the surface of the earth, the air and water to be inhabited to a greater or less extent with a peculiar growth of the lowest form of fungi—commonly termed bacteria, whose power of reproduction, under favorable conditions, is so great that a single germ will increase to fifteen million in twenty-four hours' time, and unchecked in its increase would grow to a mass of eight hundred tons, in three days' time, if space and food be furnished. There is no condition under which it can be said to be absent, unless it be from fire or air filtered through cotton-batting in numerous layers. A single drop of water containing a germ, put into water boiled, filtered and thus freed from bacteria, will grow murky in a day or two from the development of new germs. When it is considered that it requires about forty billion to weigh one grain, some remote idea can be had of the capacity of germ reproduction. Professor John Tyndall, in a late work, elaborately treats of the influence of germs in the propagation of disease and charges upon this cause, the inception and development of very many of the ailments injurious to man. Professor Pasteur, an eminent French savant, has carried his original and beautiful experiments so far, and from them deduced such practical results as very greatly to diminish the number of cases of anthrax among sheep and chicken cholera among fowls,—proving his theory that these are essentially and actually germ diseases. These germs are carried into the system through the lungs, the stomach and possibly the skin, but through the lungs chiefly. Once in the system, they begin to develop, poisoning the blood, invading the nerve centers, distributing the functional activity of the great organs of the body and inducing a general impairment of the vital processes. They are the cause of fevers, rheumatism, Bright's disease of the kidneys, pneumonia, blood poisoning, liver disease, diphtheria and many other ailments. Lately Professor Koch, a famous German physician, has proved that consumption of the lungs is due to this cause—the presence of a peculiar germ.

When the circulation is bounding, the nerves elastic and the system all aglow with life and energy, the germs seem to develop poorly if at all. But with weakened nerves, poor digestion or malassimilation of food or a lowering of vitality from any cause, a change ensues, and in this impoverished and weakened fluid the germ finds a genial home and develops until symptoms of disease are distinctly manifested. This is seen in the every-day experience of all. The healthy man resists the influences around him and does not take cold, while those whose systems have become weak from any cause readily contract colds. This is on the same principle as the germ theory. The germs attack any weakened spot in the body, and fixing themselves upon it begin their propogation. It is plain, therefore, that it is only by fortifying the weaker portions of the body that the germs of disease can be resisted and driven from the system. But this has proved almost an impossibility heretofore, and it has been the study of physicians for years how best to accomplish it. Within the past few years, however, a preparation has been attracting great attention, not only throughout the entire land, but among the medical profession and scientists generally, which is based upon this theory, and it may be safely said, no remedy has ever been found which can so successfully place the system in a condition to resist the germs of disease as Warner's Safe Cure. This article is unquestionably the best and most efficient that ever has been discovered for this purpose, and—

"John, say John! does the encyclopedia advertise Warner's Safe Cure?"

"I should not wonder, dear, it's a grand remedy, and that pamphlet we received the other day stated that Dr. Gunn, of the United States Medical College endorsed it. At all events the wonderful cures it is accomplishing entitles it to be honorably noted among the great discoveries of the present century."

However the facts above stated may be, the truth remains, that the germ theory of disease is the correct one and that the great remedy mentioned is the only one which has ever been found that can put the system in a condition to kill these germs before they obtain a hold upon the body, and undermine the life.

The Premium Wheat at the State Fair.

The premium wheat at the state fair just held at Owatonna was raised by Jacob Hurley of Ortonville, in Big Stone county, Minnesota. It was a beautiful specimen of the hard Scotch Fife, weighing sixty-three pounds to the bushel, and produced the enormous quantity of three bushels from a single quart. It was exhibited in both grain and straw, and attracted more attention than any other one thing on the ground. The size of the kernels; the bright stiff straw, the length of the heads and its enormous productiveness called forth expressions of surprise from all who saw it. Col. John H. Stevens, the veteran agriculturist, was particularly struck with it, and pronounced it the finest half-bushel of wheat he had ever seen exhibited at our fairs. It was the kind called the Saskatchewan Fife, a pure variety of the old Scotch Fife, brought down from the Saskatchewan Valley, in Manitoba, six years ago, and acclimated to our state. The original seed has been much improved by careful selection and cultivation, and it is now unquestionably the most productive and best milling wheat in the world.

The Pioneer Press Company of St. Paul, anxious to increase their subscription list, and at the same time disseminate so valuable a variety of seed, have purchased a large quantity of it direct from the propagators, and now offer it as a premium on their weekly. Any one sending in a new name at the regular price, accompanied by the cash, viz., $1.15 for a year's subscription, will be entitled to a quart of the wheat, which will be sent to any address, put up in a strong canvass sack, and delivered at the express office in Minneapolis express charges prepaid. As it sold last year at a dollar a quart, this offer is exceedingly liberal, and will doubtless lead to a very large accession to their subscription list.

With the Best Intentions.

From the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

A certain married pair were discussing the propriety of giving a wedding present, the other evening, and, as might happen in the best regulated families, failed to agree as to the object and price. The lady desired to send a cut-glass pitcher; the gentleman, scoffing at this idea, declared that nothing but silver would satisfy his taste. After a very animated session, which finally terminated in the usual way—cigars and tears—madam said she would buy her own present, and monsieur might suit himself. The next morning however repentance seized both parties, though still sulking with each other; and the gentleman, hoping to "make up" with his better half, selected on his way down town a gorgeous cut-glass jug, writing his wife's best wishes on a card and dispatching it to the expectant bride. An hour later, out sallied the wife only intent on buying what should please her spouse, and thus heap coals of fire on his recalcitrant head. The result was a costly gold-lined silver salad bowl, accompanied by the best wishes, &c., written on the gentleman's visiting pasteboard, which was duly forwarded to the same address as that of the cut glass jug. At night nothing was said of this joint manœuvre, each one wishing to surprise the other by showing the note of acknowledgement when it should arrive. It came in due course of time, but it came not alone! The postman brought two notes, which so bewildered and mystified the receivers that they indulged in another debate that ended even more disastrously than the first. The lady declares she will never again make concessions, or wedding presents, for that matter, and the gentleman takes refuge in saying, "It was just like a woman!"

PREMONITIONS OF DANGER.

A Railroad Engineer Gives his Experience.

From the Washington Critic.

"A fortnight or so ago I was on my way to the far west, traveling on a fast through B. and O. express. On a bright Sunday morning I awoke in my berth and realized that the train was standing still. I raised the curtain and peeped out. The sun was well up in the heavens and the train stood in a dense wood, away from any living creatures. It did not move for some time, and I arose, made my toilet, and went outside. The train stood partially on a long trestle work or open bridge, and I could see smoke rising from the end of the structure furthest from us. I walked out past the locomotive and on the bridge where I met a number of gentlemen talking.

"What's the matter?" I inquired of one.

"Oh, a section of the bridge has burned," replied the gentleman.

"Lucky that the engineer saw the fire in time to save us," I remarked gazing down into the water below, and shuddering at the thought of being piled up, in a sleeping car, in the chasm that yawned for me.

"But the engineer says he didn't see any fire when he stopped," exclaimed one.

"No,', said the engineer, who stood hard by, "I saw no fire. I had a presentiment as I approached the bridge. Something seemed to warn me that it was not safe to cross that bridge, and it came upon me so strongly that I just stopped the train and got out of the cab, and I hadn't walked twenty steps before I saw that the act had saved many lives, for the whole train would have gone down that hole, although it is but the length of two rails. The fire didn't show so much above the ties, as it was confined mostly to the timbers below. Right there in that little shed a watchman sleeps," said the engineer, pointing to a diminutive dwelling a half dozen rods away, "and it was his duty, and it has been for years, to be out here, and to pace over the bridge just before and after us; but somehow I felt that he was not faithful, that he might be asleep, and I could see in my mind, as I approached the bridge, the whole train going down to death, and could hear the cries of the dying, and so I just stopped, as I said. The watchman, sure enough, was asleep. Oh, you needn't laugh, for this is not the first time presentiments have saved lives when my hand was at the throttle. No, sir, I've been in just this position before," said he, blushing to the tips of his fingers, as two or three gentlemen smiled and whistled a bit.

"No," said he, 'I had a forboding of danger stronger than this a few years ago. I was running then on a division of the Sandusky. There is a little station on that road where the passenger trains seldom stop. It has a siding for freights, however, and there was nearly always a freight side-tracked as I passed through on the fast express. That little place is on a long stretch of splendid track, and for years the engineers had that as a racing ground, and I tell you some mighty good time has been made there. At the time I had this presentment the rivalry among the engineers on that stretch of track was at its height. It was a sharp winter night that I approached the station on the down trip. It was foggy and a fierce wind blew. I hadn't stopped there for three months, and as I went into that good track with a dash, and approached the village at a terrible speed, I never thought of stopping. My locomotive was the fleetest on the road, and I was congratulating myself, as the fireman drew his watch, and I was making the best time on record, and was thinking to myself how I would appal the trainmen side-tracked as I dashed through. When a quarter of a mile from the station something whispered to me to stop. I didn't want to stop; and reflecting how chagrined I would be if I would have to stop when in the heat of a successful race. I tossed my head, opened the throttle a little more, and oh, how we flew! Seems to me I never saw a train come so near flying, and yet she just lay as close to and smoothly on the track as could be. Quick as thought I was commanded by an inner being to stop, or it would make a run to death; and, without effort, my hands reversed the engine and applied the air. There was no signal, no whistle nor bell sounded, and the fireman was astounded to see my frantic movements. The train lay still a few feet past the depot, and as I jumped from my engine I felt so embarrassed that I almost burned. I could make no explanation to the conductor or the trainmen who came about me. I looked all over the engine. Everything was all right. I cast my eyes along the train. Nothing appeared wrong. Then I walked down the track in front of the engine. When I had gone less than a hundred feet, and beyond the rays of the headlight, I ran against a box car! It stood right out in front of the engine, full on the track. The switch had been left open, and the wind had skewed it out. It was loaded with carbon oil. Had I not seen it scores of persons would have been killed and burned.

"I am positive that there is such a thing as being forewarned," continued the old engineer. "That warning which stopped me on the Sandusky came only a few months after I saved, by a hair's breadth, a whole train from being wrecked in a culvert. I was dashing along one rainy night a few months before that. The country was open and my train was the night express. I had no reason to suspect any trouble, and didn't; but something told me as I was approaching a crossing that I should stop; and that desire to stop the train fastened upon me until I found myself a minute later, standing beside my engine. It was so dark I could scarcely see my hand before me. I found the culvert filled with cross ties, wedged down so closely that they would have thrown us flat on our backs, and the work was so well done that I would not have seen them had not I stopped and walked right up on them with a lantern. Did I ever see another engineer who was a believer in presentiments? Lots of them. I know old Jack Crane; and Jack Crane will swear that a foreboding is surer than eyesight itself. I remember of a thrilling story that he told me many years ago, and I have thought of it every time I have been stopped. He was running an express up in northern Ohio several years ago—it may have been on the Baltimore and Ohio—and one night he fell behind time. When he ran into a station he got out to oil his engine, and was doing it in the most mechanical way, totally absorbed in thought, when the conductor came up and remarked that they were very much behind and he hoped they would be able to make up some time before they reached the end of the run. "I shal do my very best," said Jack, "but we will be delayed at the covered bridge." The conductor asked how the delay would be caused, and Jack remarked he didn't know, but there was something wrong. He contended that there was trouble ahead, and the conductor couldn't laugh it out of him. Jack said he dashed along over that road with all the speed his engine would give him, and as he neared that bridge he made up his mind not to make a fool of himself by stopping, even if he did meet with an accident. He said his heart sank within sight of the bridge, but he nerved himself, and when within 200 feet of it thought he would go right through, believing his impression that something was wrong—gotten at the station—was but a fancy. When within 100 feet of the Long bridge, which looked dark and threatening, he was seized with a desire to reverse his engine. A terrible foreboding of disaster and death took hold of him. He could see the train crashing through the structure and hear the screams of agony as the loads of humanity were hurled to death below. Like a flash of lightning he reversed his engine and screamed down brakes. The train ran 300 feet before it stopped—almost through the bridge. Jack got out and walked ahead of the engine a few steps There he found that which had caused him to stop. The rails were opened just a few inches on either side, so that the gap could scarcely be detected, and yet so that the train would have been derailed and would have gone through the bridge and into the river. You can't make Jack Crane believe there is nothing in forebodings and premonitions."

THE WISH-RING.

From October St. Nicolas.

A young farmer who was very unlucky sat on his plow a moment to rest, and just then an old woman crept past and criedit "Why do you go on drudging day and night without reward? Walk two days till you come to a great fir-tree that stands all alone in the forest and overtops all other trees. If you can hew it down, you will make your fortune."

Not waiting to have the advice repeated, the farmer shouldered his ax and started on his journey. Sure enough, after tramping two days, he came to the fir-tree, which he instantly prepared to cut down. Just as the tree swayed, and before it fell with a crash, there dropped out of its branches a nest containing two eggs. The eggs rolled to the ground and broke, and there darted out of one a young eagle, and out of the other rolled a gold ring. The eagle grew larger, as if by enchantment, and when it reached the size of a man it spread its wings as if to try their strength; then, soaring upward, it cried: "You have rescued me; take as a reward the ring that lay on the other egg, it is a wish-ring. Turn it on your finger twice, and, whatever you wish is, it shall be fulfilled. But there is but a single wish in the ring. No sooner is that granted than it loses its power. and is only an ordinary ring. Therefore consider well what you desire, so that you may never have reason to repent your choice." So speaking, the eagle soared high in the air, circled over the farmer's head a few times, then darted, like an arrow, toward the east.

The farmer took the ring, placed it on his finger, and turned on his way homeward. Toward evening he reached a town where a jeweler sat in his shop behind a counter, on which lay many costly rings for sale. The farmer showed his own, and asked the merchant its value.

"It isn't worth a straw," the jeweler answered.

Upon that the farmer laughed very heartily, and told the man that it was a wish-ring, and of greater value than all the rings in the shop together.

The jeweler was a wicked, designing man, and he invited the farmer to remain as his guest over night, "For," he explained, "only to shelter a man who owns a wish-ring must bring luck."

So he treated his guests to wine and fair words; and that night, as the farmer lay sound asleep, the wicked man stole the magic ring from his finger and slipped on, in its place, a common one which he had made to resemble the wish-ring.

The next morning the jeweler was all impatience to have the farmer begone. He awakened him at cock-crow, and said: "You had better go, for you have still a long journey before you."

As soon as the farmer had departed the jeweler closed his shop, put up the shutters, so that no one could peep in, bolted the door behind him, and, standing in the middle of the room, he turned the ring and cried: "I wish instantly to possess a million gold pieces!"

No sooner said than the great shining gold pieces came pouring down upon him in a golden torrent over his head, shoulders and arms. Pitifully he cried for mercy, and tried to reach and unbar the door; but before he succeeded, he stumbled and fell bleeding to the ground. As for the golden rain it never stopped until the weight of metal crushed the floor, and the jeweler and his money sank through to the cellar. The gold still poured down till the million was complete, and the jeweler lay dead in the cellar beneath his treasure.

The noise, however. alarmed the neighbors, who came rushing over to see what the matter was; when they saw the man dead under his gold, they exclaimed: "Doubly unfortunate he whom blessings kill." Afterward the heirs came and divided up the property.

In the meantime the farmer reached home in high spirits and showed the ring to his wife.

"Henceforth we shall never more be in want, dear wife," he said. "Our fortune is made. Only we must be very careful to consider well just what we wish."

The farmer's wife, of course, proffered advice. "Suppose," said she, "that we wish for that bit of land that lies between our two fields."

"That isn't worth while," her husband replied. "If we work hard for a year we'll earn enough money to buy it."

So the two worked very hard, and at harvest time they had never raised such a crop before. They had earned money enough to buy the coveted strip of land, and still have a bit to spare. "See" said the man, "we have the land and wish as well."

The farmer's wife then suggested that they had better wish for a cow and a horse. But the man replied: "Wife, why waste our wish on such trifles? The horse and cow we'll get anyway."

Sure enough, in a year's time the money for the horse and cow had been earned. Joyfully the man rubbed his hands. "The wish is saved again this year, and yet we have what we desire. How lucky we are!"

But now his wife seriously adjured him to wish for something at last. "Now that you have a wish to be granted, you slave and toil and are content with everything. You might be King, Emperor, Ruler, even a gentleman farmer, with chests overflowing with gold; but you don't know what you want."

"We are young and life is long," he answered. "There is only one wish in the ring, and that is easily said. Who knows but some time we may sorely need this wish? Are we in want of anything? Have we not prospered to all people's astonishment since we possessed this ring? Be reasonable and patient for a while. In the meantime consider what we really ought to wish for."

And that was the end of the matter.

It really seemed as if the ring had brought a blessing into the house. Granaries and barns were full to overflowing, and in the course of few years the poor farmer became a rich and portly person, who worked with his men afield during the day, as if he, too, had to earn his daily bread; but after supper he liked to sit on his porch, contented and comfortable, and return the kindly greeting of the folds who passed and who wished him a respectful good evening.

So the years went by. Sometimes, when they were alone the farmer's wife would remind her husband of the magic ring, and suggest many plans. But as he always answered that they had plenty of time, and that the best thoughts come last, she more and more rarely mentioned the ring, and at last the good woman ceased speaking of it altogether.

To be sure, the farmer looked at the ring and twirled it about as many as twenty times a day; but he was very careful never to wish.

After thirty or forty years had passed away, and the farmer and his wife had grown old and white-haired, and their wish was still unasked, then was God very good to them, and on the same night they died peacefully and happily.

Weeping children and grandchildren surrounded the two coffins; and as one wished to remove the ring from the still hand as a rememberance, the oldest son aid: "Let our father take his ring into the grave. There was always a mystery about it; perhaps it was some dear remembrance. Our mother, too, so often looked at the ring—she may have given it to him when they were young."

So the old farmer was buried with the ring, which had been supposed to be a wish ring, and was not; yet it brought as much good fortune into the house as the heart could desire.

NURSING THE SICK.

From All the Year Round.

To minister to the sick is one of the noblest ambitions of the present age, as evidenced by the number of people who voluntarily devote themselves to such duties, independently of the calls of affection or considerations of reward. To be a good nurse requires rare combination of excellencies in the same individuall—intelligence, physical strength, a kind disposition with firmness, a light hand and foot, courage greater than that which animates the soldier on the battle-field, and, above all, untiring patience. Given these, and the nurse becomes more than half the remedy, not only inspiring confidence on the part of the patient, but of the surgeon or physician also, who can rely that his instructions will be carried out with implicit obedience to the letter. Such a paragon, however, is rarely to be met with, except as an emissary foom one or another of these admirable institutions where ladies are trained under skillful management for this work; and in the vast majority of cases an invalid is placed in the hands of his immediate friend or relations, who, with the best intentions, it must be confessed often prejudice his comfort and retard his recovery by the over anxiety which is bred of affection. The object of this paper is not to convey the instructions necessary for the education of an accomplished nurse—a difficult task—but to enumerate a few small points which should be avoided, as tending greatly to the discomfort of the patient, and for the guidance of those who, without previous experience, find themselves suddenly thrust into this most responsible position.

Quietude is a great thing, of course; but real quietude means the absence of all excitement and it must be remembered that anything out of the common will tend to excite the mind of a sufferer. Do not, therefore, walk on tip-toe; for this, in addition to its unusual elaboration of the gait, invariably causes a certain amount of creaking. Speak in low tones, but don't whisper; a whisper will often awake a sleeper who would not be disturbed by ordinary conversation; and never say "Hush!" Let your clothes and foot covering be of as noiseless and unobtrusive a character as possible, and instead of gliding and tottering about like a rickety ghost, do not hesitate to walk. If you have occasion to say anything in the room, say it so the patient can hear it if he wishes, and do not let him be aware of your conspiring privately with the others, especially at the door. That door has much to answer for. If it be visible from the bed people open it cautiously, put their heads in, and slowly withdraw again. If, as is more frequently the case, it is screened by the bed-curtains, mysterious openings and shuttings are heard, unattended with any apparent ingress or egress and sotto voce colloquies go on outside. When you enter do so honestly and at once; do not spend five minutes in turning the handle like a house breaker, thereby producing a series of irritating little clicks, finally terminating in a big snap, with which the door flies open. If the latch be at all rusty, a handle that is slowly wound back in this way will often stick, and even require to be rattled back into position, or, left as it is, may start back suddenly, after a time, of its own accord, with a report like a pistol shot! It is always well to recollect that it by no means follows that a sick person is asleep because his eyes are shut; he may be acutely conscious of all that is passing in the room, though unable or unwilling to make any sign; and nothing can be more maddening, under such circumstances, than to have people hush sh-shing and whispering around and creaking about on the tips of their toes, we have all sympathized in our hearts with poor Leicester Dedlock when his tongue was smitten with paralysis with his sister constantly bending over him with clasped hands and murmuring, "He is a sleep!" till goaded to desperation, he makes signs for his slate, and writes, "I am not."

Never stand at the foot of the bed and look at the patient. While talking to him, it is better to sit by the side of the bed, and as near the pillow as possible, so that you may converse easily, while your face and body are turned in the same direction as his. By this means you can make all necessary observation of his features without enforcing the arrest of his eyes to your own, which is so embarrassing and disagreeable to one lying in bed, and is almost unavoidable when facing him. Keep him in as comfortable a position as possible, by all means. but don't be too demonstrative in smoothing the pillows and little offices of that sort. Fidgety attentions will worry him, and do him more harm than downright neglect.

Incombustible Paper.

Mr. G. Meyer, at a recent meeting of the Societe d'Encouragemet, exhibited a new paste combination designed for the manufacture of incombustible card board or paper of all sorts and shades. Asbestos was the principal thing employed in its manufacture, He presented specimens in writing, printing, engraving, etc., made with his inks of different colors, and also showed a water color drawing that had been submitted to the fiery ordeal of the potter's furnace. The painting had preserved all its brilliancy and the paper all its flexibility. A lithograph, 15 by 16 centimeters, was placed between two layers of glass in a state of fusion. On removal the paper was found to have completely resisted the action of the heat, and the engraving to have preserved all its sharpness.

FIELD AND FARM.

Make the House Attractive.

It is a common complaint that farmers' sons are deserting the farm. Instead of following the occupation of their fathers, they flock to the cities and larger towns work at a trade or to engage in a mercantile life. The cause of this exodus from the farm is that the home is not attractive. In too many farm-houses the daily-life is one "horrid grind," with few pleasures and scarcely any recreation. Books are rare, and literally and scientific papers almost unknown. From early morn till bed-time it is work. There is little conversation or reading or music to relieve the monotony.

Unless boys and girls are allowed recreation and mental food the home will become dull and prosy, and the energetic and ambitious, longing for a change, will go out from it to seek a broader and more diversified life.

A happy childhood and a home associated with delightful memories have power to hold young men and women as with chains of steel. Farmers have much leisure in the winter, and if they would manage to make home attractive it would be easier than it is to keep the children on the farm, and to inspire them with a love of their father's vocation. Farming is essential to national growth, and ought to command the services of the most enterprising and energetic young men of our day.

Pretty Worsted Tidy.

This tidy is knit in stripes. It requires two coarse steel needles, two skeins of garnet, Germantown yarn, and one and one-half skeins of old gold.

Cast on twenty-two stitches, knit across plain, purl back, and so on, until you have knit across ten times. Now just reverse this, and knit ten times the same as before. This makes it in rows across the stripe, one row plain, the other purled and so on, until you have the length you wish your tidy. (This quantity of yarn will make a very long tidy.) Then bind off six stitches, drop two, bind off six, drop two, and bind off the last six. Now ravel the stitches dropped to the end of the stripe. You want three stripes of garnet and two of old gold. Crochet them together, and fringe the ends. This makes a very pretty tidy, and any one that knows how to knit the heel of a stocking can knit this without any trouble. When you crochet the stripes together, have the plain row come opposite the purl. This is easily done as there is no right or wrong side.

Food for Dyspeptics.

Milk puddings and stewed fruit are excellent for the dyspeptic, the bilious and the gouty, as my experience tells me; and for one of those who suffers from taking sugar, nineteen would be all the better for stewed fruit. But for those who dislike sweets, and for those who suffer from acidity, it is well to prepare the stewed fruit with alkalise, completely and solely or partially, as the case may be. This may sound very heterodox to some readers, but just let the incredulous test the matter for themselves. For the dyspeptic, the gouty, the bilious and the glybosuric individual (as well as the truly rheumatic, a small class), fruit stewed with an alkali in the proportion of as much bicarbonate of soda as will lie upon a shilling to the pound of fruit when put in the oven will be found to be palatable and permissionable. It saves the gastric acidity from the acetous fermentation of the sugar in the dyspeptic, or with the glycosuric relieves him from the excess of cane sugar which disagrees with him. When there is distinct gout, not only in fruit stewed with an alkali good and unobjectionable, but it it be prepared with the bicarbonate of potash it is converted into a therapeutic agent of no means value, while the resultant product is quite sweet enough for a palate which has outlived the "sweet-tooth" period. The whole matter is a simple one, yet it seems to contain much promise for many persons.—English Doctor.

Rotation of Crops.

A correspondent of the County Gentleman says that "it is now generally admitted that rotation of crops is rendered necessary, not, as formerly supposed, because the soil becomes exhausted of some important element, or becomes unwholesome for that particular plant, owing to poisonous excreta left by the roots, but because insects and diseases accompany the plant which are special to it, the eggs or spores of which are left in the soil to attack the same crop in the next following year with a hundredfold increase of numbers and power. Prof. Bessy of the Iowa Agricultural College shows how this is the case with smut, which grows up through all the interior of a wheat plant and finally developes its spores within the bran casing of the grain, filling it not with flour, but with innumerable black, stinking seeds of the parasites which, when set free float out and stick fast to sound grains of wheat and also to particles of the soil, where they lie ready to enter into the circulation of the next year's growth of wheat plants, unless killed by steeping the polluted seed in blue vitriol solution and drying off with lime. As to the polluted soil, it is purified from the contamination only by using it for some other crop on which the smut plant cannot take hold."

Agricultural Items.

All fruits ripen better in the dark than in the light, tomatoes included, says the Farm Journal.

Mr. Thomas D. Baird, in the American Garden states that he tried several experiments with tomatoes, and found that those which had been "topped" (cutting off a portion of the upper part) were larger and four days earlier than others not so treated. Vines not staked were not as productive as those that were, and the vines that were only seldom pruned bore the poorest of all.

A method of treating raspberries is mentioned by Mr. Hopkins of Franklin county, Ind., who with half of thirty bills of red raspberries upon one and a sixteenth rods of land, which are eighteen years old, procures a good crop of fruit every year—as high as sixty-two quarts in a season. The bushes are trimmed to two or three strong stalks per hill each spring, and cut back to two feet from the ground The ground has never been hard, is well mulched, and all sprouts picked off the vines as fast as they come up, and added to the mulch thus keeping the soil moist and free from the sun. This rate of yield would give 270 bushels to the acre.

Says the Farmer and Fruit Grower: "Clover seed retailed at the enormous figure of $6 per bushel this spring, and was scarce at that. It is strange, our farmers do not make the seed a farm crop. The first growth of clover can be cut in June for hay, and the seed may be taken from the second crop in September."

A correspondent of the Fruit Recorder mentions that he used carbolic acid and soapsuds on his plum trees, with perfect success, as a remedy for curculio. He used one large spoonful of the acid to a bucket of suds, stirred it thoroughly and dashed it up through the trees with a tin cup.

The New York Times suggest that farmers steep their seed wheat in some caustic solution that will destroy the germs of rust and smut. These substances destroy the spores or seeds of the minute plants that produce the diseases. Smut is rapidly increasing, and precautions should be taken to prevent it.

Says Fuller in his Small Fruit Culturist: "I do not believe there is one acre of strawberries in a thousand in this country that yields over one-half what it would if the ground was properly prepared before planting.

The shoots of this season's growth should be cut from grape vines, gooseberry and currant bushes any time from the 1st of November to the middle of December.

The buzzing of bees, mosquitoes, and similar insects is produced by their wings and not by their mouth. The songs of our grasshoppers and crickets are produced by rubbing the wings together, or in the former by rubbing the wings on the legs. The whirling of the cicada or, as it is erroneously called, locust, is produced by a drum-like apparatus situated on the abdomen. Insects do not have any vocal organs in the mouth or throat.

Magnificent Dresses.

The most fashionable of rich dress materials for the coming season, besides satin and velvet, are the magnificent brocades and brocatelles, with brilliantly colored small flowers on grounds of darkest ruby, bronze, myrtle green, olive, garnet and wood brown, shot with silver or gold: beautifully ribbed Ottoman silks in all the new artistic shades, both for day and evening use; Pekin with the stripes of satin and velvet of uncommon width and greatly improved quality, and lampas with plain grounds brocaded with wide stripes covered with sprays of flowers, foliage, and small fruits. For reception and dinner toilets are imported most superb tissues woven with threads of real gold or silver, damasks of the "stand alone" quality fit for a queen, with grounds of heavy Lyons satin in pale shades of mauve, flesh, cameo, exquisite new tints of pink and blue, brocaded with both small and immense sprays of flowers and leaves in raised velvet of a very dark shade in wondrous contrast to the delicate background. There are also an endless variety of new plushes, thicker and richer than ever before seen; plain, ribbed, shot, cisele, stamped, and repousse. Next in order come the velveteens, which are of new and elegant quality and coloring are taking rank along with velvets, many of which they surpass both in appearance and durability. Then follow the tweeds and the myriad mixed woollen materials, the Scotland and English brands being in great demand.

Bonnet Ornaments.

The bonnet ornaments are very rich and unique. Large silver gilt balls are set with Rhine pebbles. Some pins have finely engraved oxidized silver heads in many unique designs, such as arrow tips, lances, red gold battle axes, enameled sprays of flowers, a sphinx head in antique silver, shark's skin head studded with glittering steel, gilt spiders, all manner of bugs, squirrel's feet mounted on steel and other small legs and feet of some unknown animals in brown or white fur, set in oxidized silver. Owls' heads of immense and small size and wings and pompons of the greatest variety, the flattened back and head of a rooster and other flat shapes of birds are used in profusion. Ribbons are two inches wide for one pair only of strings. The novelties consist of pretty ornaments of carved wood, showing griffins, unicorns, dragon's tusks, fastened on to long steel or silver pins; old silver and oxidized silver of Greenaway children at play; a stile and girls leaning against it; a wind-mill and Don Quixote at full charge; hounds in chase, swallows on the wing, and many other curious designs of a funny character are executed in the finest metal.

Miscellaneous Matters.

The Puritans of New England had their own way of testifying how much they thought of the female sex. If a man and a woman were convicted of a capital crime, they hanged the man and burnt the woman. Mr. Bonner's Ledger recalls the last instance of this fine discrimination. It occurred in 1775, at Cambridge, when two servants were executed for poisoning their master. They were drawn on a sled to the place of execution, and, Mark, a fellow of about thirty, was hanged, and Phyllis, an old creature, was burnt to death.

The Yellowstone National Park is larger than Delaware and Rhode Island combined,—being 55 miles wide by 65 long, and embracing 3,575 square miles. It lies mainly in the northwestern corner of Wyoming, but includes a thin strip of Idaho on the west and Montana on the west and north. The body of it is between 110 deg. and 111 deg. west longitude, and 44 deg. and 45 deg. north latitude. The lowest elevation in the park is 6,000 feet above the sea level, and its highest mountain peak from 10,000 to 12,000 feet. It is an immense table land, with a surface broken into mountain ranges, gorges, canyons and valleys.

An amusing incident recently took place at Chalons-sur-Marne, where a menagerie had arrived. The lion-tamer was struck by a bright idea, and got up a raffle for a lion whelp. This new kind of lottery attracted a great many idlers, all anxious to win, and yet frightened at the motion. A banker's clerk won the lion, and turned dreadfully pale. His wife screamed and cried so energetically at the notion of the invasion of this new inmate into her household that the colonel of a regiment bought the animal for 200 francs.

The owner of an iron furnace in Alabama states that he is steadily producing pig iron at a cost of $8 per ton. In Virginia the cost is $12 per ton, in Tennessee $11, while at Pittsburg each ton turned out cost $19. This difference in favor of the southern furnaces is largely due to the cheaper labor of that section. Another cause contributing to the lower cost of production there is the fact that the southern furnaces are located immediately at, or very near the mines, and the expense of handling the ore between the mines and the furnace is therefore very nominal. In Alabama the iron industry is a new one, and the one is reached at no great distance below the surface. It may be added that the Alabama pig iron is at present made at less cost than that of England.

A countryman strayed into a store in Springfield recently, and found the proprietor talking through the telephone. "What are yer doing thar agin the wall, Mister?" "Talking to my friend." "But whar is he? I don't see him." "Why he is eight miles away." With the exclamation, "By tounder!" the granger stalked off. At night he said to his wife, "I never want to go to Springfield again; they lie so like blazes there. I wouldn't trust 'em with a clam shell. Why, wife a tarnal fool there talking away at a board tried to fool me by saying he was speaking to a man eight miles away! The big liar thought he could make me believe that story."

A western mining paper tells this story, which will probably rapidly find its way into the Sunday schools: H. H. White who has been working on the Dunkirk mine for some time past, last Sunday while reading the Bible under the large pines east of the mine about half a mile, becoming absorbed in thought, unconsciously dropped the book from his hands in such a way that it fell over a precipice about fifty feet high. Descending into the canyon to recover it, Mr. White found it lying upward, open at the gospel of St. Matthew. chapter vii, while a large piece of rich quartz, which had been dislodged by its fall, lay on top, tearing a jagged hole in the seventh verse: "Ask and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Accepting this as a good omen, M. White searched, and in but a few moments, succeeded in locating the ledge which was over two feet in width and assays $225 on an average, to the ton. The mine is considered the richest thing yet struck in the district, and an offer of $5000, made the fortunate owner of it, was declined.

KITTY CLYDE.

"Kitty! Kitty Clyde! Where are you?"

Nobody answered. A robin building her nest in the great apple tree over the south door, looked up, listened a minute, and then whistled softly to himself. He was not going to betray Kitty Clyde—not he. The great dog Rover, had declined Kitty's invitation to go off frolicing with her, the girl had patted his head softly, touched her red lips to the snow white star in Rover's dusky forehead—Rover's beauty spot—and then flitted carelessly away, her bright brown curls tossing in the west wind, and the fragment of a song running over from that blithsome little heart of hers.

And so at this very minute Kitty is standing ankle-deep in the clear, cool blue water of the pond, trying with all her might and main to reach a great, splendid lily that, with all its golden stamens hid and petals half closed, was just going to sleep for the night. To be sure, Kitty had already a whole apronful of the pure, sweet flowers; but when was ever mortal man or woman either satisfied with what they already had—when did they not long and strive after what was just beyond reach? And so it came to pass that as Kitty pulled and tugged, the soft, treacherous bank gave way, and down went Kitty, clean muslin dress, apronful of lilies, spotless white stockings and dainty slippers, golden brown curls and all, into the cold dark water.

"O-o-h!" cried Kitty, struggling in the water.

And then, in a minute, something seized her, and lifted her sheer out of the water, and set her high and—oh, no—not at all dry, but very wet indeed, among the violets, up on the green bank.

Was it Rover? Kitty shook the water out of her eyes, swallowed a sob or two, and looked. And then she blushed all over her white face, and away down to the tiny lace ruffle about her throat For her preserver was a young man, a very proper and unexpecticnable, young man, indeed, in a faultless black suit, which never saw a speck of lint since it was a suit. And this young man who was quite tall—a very giant beside Kitty, in fact—surveyed her with a face in which amusement and surprise were as strongly expressed as if they had been written in letters right across his handsome, broad forehead.

"Well," said he, his dark eyes shining down upon her, "you are only the worse off by a wetting! What would have become of you if I had not happened by just as I did?"

"I daresay I shouldn't have drowned,' said Kitty demurely. "But I am very much obliged to you."

"You are very much welcome! In return, perhaps you can tell me where Deacon Grey lives. I was just about to ask you, when you disappeared from my astonished eyes, in the pond.

"Poor Kitty!" Who could wonder that she blushed again, like a red, red rose, and wished from the bottom of her little heart that she had drowned among the lilies—for was not this new young minister, younger and handsomer than Kitty—who had only known old Parson Brown, with his snuffled tones and grizzled wig—had ever dreamed a minister could be? and had she not been charged over and over again to behave properly in his presence? And now—poor Kitty Clyde!

"Deacon Gray lives there," said Kitty, who must speak, though she died, pointing at the great, square, red farmhouse glowing in the afternoon sun.

"That house there, in the clover field, with the apple trees around it?"

"Yes sir! The clover-field comes up to the door. Isn't it pretty?" said Kitty forgetting her wet clothes, and what her aunt would say; in her girlish artistic delight in the picture.

"Very pretty," said the young man. "Very pretty, indeed!" he repeated looking into the sweet young eyes, and seeing the rosy color come and go under the clear, fine-grained beautiful skin.

A full half minute he stood thus, and then he started suddenly:

"I beg your pardon! I should not have kept you. You will take cold!"

As he spoke he lifted his hat, bowed and turned away from her. In a minute or two, he was out of sight, around the bend in the road.

"How very handsome he is!" thought Kitty. "And he bowed to me just as they do in stories, Oh, dear, what a figure I am! And now I shall never dare speak to him.' And two great shining tears glittered in Kitty's brown eyes.

Slowly she made her way home, and crept around to the well-room door. The parlor was open, and she heard her cousin Julia speaking, and the odor of her aunt Grey's cake came out, delicious and tempting, and the tea-kettle was singing on the hearth.

And Kitty was very cold and wet, and most unpoetically hungry. But she slipped off upstairs unseen.

An hour or two passed. Supper was served in the hospitable farm-house kitchen. And supper being over, Deacon Frey lit his pipe, and began to discuss free-will with the young minister.

"You'd better go into the parlor, father," said Mrs. Grey.

"Oh, no matter about the parlor, wife," said the obtuse deacon. "Mr. Weston likes the kitchen well enough, I'll warrant."

Mr. Weston laughed.

"Oh, yes, he liked the kitchen!"

And he sat down on the old fashioned settle, and seemed as much at home as if he had been a son of the family.

"I wouldn't let the table set any longer for Kitty," said Julia, gathering up the cups and saucers with a dainty grace.

Mrs. Grey remembered the Lady Washington cake which Kitty was so fond of, and the strawberries Kitty had picked, and her good heart was divided between impatience and pity.

"Oh, dear," she sighed, "that good-for-nothing Kitty Clyde tires me to death."

"What's Kitty been doing now?" asked the deacon.

"Oh, don't ask! Isn't she always doing what she oughtn't to, and neglecting everything she ought to do? Idling about the fields all day, and reading novels and poetry, and she can't make a loaf of bread to save her life. Julia," added the matron despairingly, "go and call her all over the house."

And so Julia's silvery "Kitty! Kitty Clyde!" resounded through the wide rooms.

And pretty soon a small figure glided silently down in the twilight.

"Ah, there you are! Now eat your supper, so we can clear off the table," said Mrs. Grey, reprovingly.

Kitty sat down, still as a mouse, and helped herself to bread and butter and strawberries, and, unhappy as she had been, was making a very good meal, when all at once her aunt said:

"Are there any pond-lilies about."

Miss Julia just then sailed out of the parlor, a graceful white cloud in the dusk.

"Oh, yes. There are some great dishes of them in the parlor. We have them all the time," she said graciously, forgetting to add that good-for-nothing Kitty Clyde gathered and arranged them.

"I thought I detected the odor! How lovely they are!"

"Oh, very lovely!" said Julia, with a sweet enthusiasm.

"That reminds me," said the young minister laughing softly, "that I had a bit of an adventure coming from the station."

"An adventure coming from Cloverdale Station to our house!" cried Julia. "Pray, what was it?"

"Why, a little girl—at least she was very small, though she might have been grown up—was picking lilies in the pond just down here, and fell in. Of course I pulled her out."

"Pulled her out!" Did she get wet?"

It was Mrs. Grey. She had come in with a lighted lamp.

"I'm afraid she did!" said Mr. Weston, his eyes twinkling.

Unfortunate Kitty Clyde! The cruel light of the lamp fell full upon her face, and betrayed the deep blushes and tearful, downcast eyes.

"Kitty Clyde, was that you?" said Mrs. Grey, in a stern and awful voice.

Kitty choked and tried to get up.

"And you got your new muslin wet. Oh, Kitty Clyde you are the worst good-for-nothing girl in the whole world."

"I—I don't care!" sobbed Kitty, and she fled from the table and ran up-stairs, crying very bitterly.

"Now, mother, you've scared her most to death. You'd ought to be thankful she wasn't drowned," said the good deacon.

"I hope I am, Deacon Grey," said his wife. "I hope I don't wish any harm to the child, though she is such a trial."

"Oh, well, well! we can't expect all girls to be like our Julia."

"Julia never caused me a moment's anxiety in her life," said her mother.

That remarkable young lady came in just then, and Mr. Weston examined her with interest. She was really a very pretty girl, lady-like, and well-bred.

"And what a good girl she must be!" thought the reverend Edward Weston.

Yes, Julia was a pretty girl and a good girl. And Mr. Weston wanted a wife. Is that strange? Not a bit of it. All young men who are manly and pure do—when the right time comes.

Cloverdale quite agreed that Mr. Weston wanted a wife, and when he was properly installed, and everything was as it should be, the good people took counsel together, and decided that he couldn't find a better wife than Julia Grey.

Apparently Mr. Weston was of a similar opinion. And yet, perhaps not. Perhaps it was only in a friendly way that he took Julia out to ride, and out boating on the pond, and to walk in the sweet starry summer evenings. Sometimes Kitty Clyde was with them—oftener not. Sometimes she started with them, but was off directly in quest of some gay night-roses.

And so Mr. Weston found obstacles in the way of studying Kitty's character. It was a study which interested him more and more. But somehow the flower which at times opened to him, and let him drink in its sweetness and fragrance, at other times folded itself away in silence. And the reverend Edward Wetson was exceedingly disturbed.

But he never asked himself what it meant, till one golden evening in the early October, when Jamie Wood, a stalwart young farmer, came in, and looked hard at Kitty in all the pauses of the talk. And at last Kitty slipped away. Then up rose Jamie Wood, and took a sorrowful, disappointed leave.

"Jamie is sadly in love, poor fellow!" said Julia, tenderly.

"In love! with whom?" said Mr. Weston, rousing up.

"Oh, Kitty Clyde, of course. It would be an excellent match for Kitty, only she is so perverse."

The reverend Edward Weston felt a sharp stab near his heart.

An hour later he was walking up and down a moonlit path, and thinking very hard and fast, when suddenly a white wraith glided out of the trees, and would have passed him, but he put one hand and detained it.

"Kitty, I want to tell you something. What! Will you run away from me as you do from your lover?"

Kitty shook in his hands.

"Jamie Wood is not my lover," she said, passionately. I won't have him. Let me go Mr. Weston!"

"Wait a minute Kitty. I want a wife. Everybody says I do, and I am sure of it. But I want nobody but you, for I love you dearly."

"Me," said the bewildered girl. "Such a good for nothing as I? Oh, you can't mean it."

"I do, Kitty—you, just as you are. Oh, my darling, God is good to send me such a treasure," and he gathered her in his arms, and Kitty's longing, loving heart fairly ached with happiness.

A Lucky Hit.

Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

A French servant in the family of a well-known gentleman in this city, with that thrift characteristic of the French people, invested 500 francs, some time ago, in the loan securities of the City of Paris. He has allowed the interest to accumulate on his investment since 1882, and recently he gave the requisite authority to a friend in Paris to collect the same. On presenting the number of the certificate, the agent was informed by the financial agents of the loan in Paris that the certificate in question had drawn the "premium lot" of 100,000 francs in the last annual drawing under the provisions of the municipal loan. The lucky holder of the certificate was promptly notified of his good fortune, and with what joy he received the announcement may be imagined. The tale, it must be confessed, sounds like a pure romance, or a lottery advertisement; but it has the merit of being absolutely true. The lucky Frenchman is now in the West, travelling as valet with a Boston gentleman who owns a cattle ranch in Colorado; but he will shortly return to take his family to Paris, where they expect to enter upon the enjoyment of their good fortune.

The story comes from North Carolina of a dog that climbs trees after opossums and coons. He doesn't stick his toe nails in like a cat, but climbs like a boy. Recently he shinned up a big elm and caught an immense coon. During the fight that ensued they both fell to the ground, but the dog had the best of the fall and won the trick.

Theatrical Critics Sharpen Their Pencils and Prepare for the Proposed Slaughter of the Innocent Stars.

Society Circles in a State of Holy Horror Over the Revelations Regarding a Pair of Shining Lights.

Notes Anent the Newspaper War, Monthly Magazines and Other Timely Topics.

NEW YORK, Special Correspondence, Oct. 10.—The chief topic of local talk is the superfluity of opera with which we are to be regaled this season, beginning with the opening of the new Metropolitan Opera house by Mr. Abbey on the 22d. I went through the Metropolitan Opera house yesterday. Standing in the proscenium arch, which is fifty-five feet in the clear, the amphitheater of seats and boxes sweeps aloft with tremendous spaciousness. The orchestra chairs are large and low, as well as numerous; and above them are piled the three tiers of boxes, snugly set, and above these the balcony and the family circle. The whole interior is a rich monochrome in gold, the modifications being only old gold, copper and burnt bronze. The exterior of the building does not at all correspond to the interior, being neither beautiful nor imposing. It has no more style and architectural grace than a barn, and looks, to the spectator coming up Seventh avenue or down Broadway, a good deal like a Duluth elevator. It might profitably have been put into the hands of an architect of reputation and taste. Mapleson shows to the public an unblanched face and a stiff upper lip, and is apparently courageous for the fray, but it is privately reported that the academy of music subscribers are making certain conditions, that if a specified number of boxes and seats are not sold by the 20th there will be arrangements for a short season there, in which Patti will not appear at all.

CRITICAL STRIKERS.

In any case the newspaper dramatic critics are sharpening their pencils and wits for an active campaign. I blush to say that some of the best known of these gentlemen connected with the press of this city have an exceedingly mercenary side, and do not scruple or hesitate to "strike" either managers or artists for money, board, clothes, jewelry, or other valuables. I know an impressario who was compelled to open and keep a large summer cottage at Long Branch, where six or eight of these gentlemen went with their wives and stayed for many weeks. I know two dramatic critics who were discharged from the Herald; one who was discharged from the World, and one who was very summarily put out of an evening paper for unscrupulously blackmailing noted singers. Every prima dona who ever sang a season in New York has had to pay money to some dramatic critic for their favor. I know a critic whose wife said to a noted prima donna who will sing here this winter: "Come! You are going to Europe this week. Bring me a camel's hair shawl when you return in the fall. Don't fail!" And the cantatrice bought it and laid it about the fair shoulders. I know another who wears a watch got by the same complacent assurance. What a world this is! Charles Reade's soldier shouted, as he marched through Europe, "The devil is dead!" But I now recollect that he laughed when he made the announcement. The publishers of the New York papers have seldom sold their opinions—except when they have unhappily fallen into the clutches of railroad or telegraph magnates. But they are not always wholly impartial. A celebrated singer told me this week two stories of the elder Bennett. When Parepa first came to this country she called at the Bennett mansion and presented a letter of introduction which she brought from Europe. Mrs. Bennett, who was a dressy and rather magnificent society lady, received her in the parlor, and, after welcoming her, bore her to the library where her distinguished husband was at his desk.

"Father," said Mrs. Bennett, "Father! Here is Mme. Parepa, come to ask the protection of our paper."

Mr. Bennett expressed his pleasure at seeing her, but Parepa bridled perceptibly, and exclaimed earnestly:

"No! no! Pardon me! You surely mistake. I do not come to ask the protection of the Herald, but only to present a personal letter of introduction from your friends."

Constraint and embarrassment followed. Mrs. Bennett was angry. The call was short. And the Herald never gave a word of cordial praise to Parepa till both her host and hostess were dead. Another: When Madame Gazzaniga, the finest singer of her time, was in this city, she called on Mrs. Bennett one day and waited for her half an hour in the drawing-room, and then left. On letting her out, the servant asked:

"Who shall I tell her called?"

"Tell her," said the prima donna, "that she will find my card on the piano."

And there, sure enough, it was found, "Gazzaniga," scrawled in the dust that had blown in that summer morning on the polished piano lid! Instead of being offended, Mrs. Bennett was at once pleased by the impudence and liveliness of her caller, and thenceforward the two were good friends, and the Herald could never say enough for her.

"I remember," said Mr. George Jones of the Times, to me the other day, "when James Gordon Bennett was knocked down in front of the Broadway bank yonder, by somebody whom the paper had offended—an actor, I believe. Mr. Bennett jumped up, brushed off the dirt, picked up his hat, and said to the man, 'Well, what's the trouble? What are you striking me for?' 'For your d—d impudence!' said his angry assailant. 'But I ain't impudent,' pleaded Bennett: 'it's the paper.' I don't know whether the man saw either the force of the discrimination or the ludicrousness of it."

THE PAPERS AND MAGAZINES.

I called at the Sun office this morning and asked Mr. Dana about the effect of the Times and Herald cut on his circulation. He showed me a statement from his books, and said frankly: "Our daily circulation now is about 141,000, against 155,000 along in July. This is a loss of, say 14,000. But there is always a little falling off at this season of the year. Just how much we have lost by the cutting down of price by the other papers, we do not know; and, of course, its future effect is still more problematical. We do not fear it."

The Herald's campaign against the newsboys has been short, sharp and decisive, ending in a complete victory for the paper. One thing has been developed by this combat: that there too many dailies in New York. There are now fifteen morning papers that I know of, and probably some that I never see. This is too many. Some of them got have to go to the wall within the next year or two.

The new magazine, the Manhattan, is said to have one of the firm of Arnold, Constable & Co. as its chief backer. It is making a very creditable fight for existence, but it must have hard sledding. Mr. Roswell Smith, publisher of the Century, with whom I spent some days at Lucerne this summer, told me that it cost about $6,000 a number to get out that beautiful magazine. Among the chief impediments to magazine publishing is the fact that we have few writers of good short stories in this country, and few writers of long stories who can divide them skillfully for a serial. Just think of Charles Dickens' work. He undertook to write to space, and he did it wonderfully well. Before beginning a novel he contracted to write a book of 640 pages to appear in sixteen monthly parts of forty pages each. Each monthly part was not only to be exactly forty pages, but it was, if possible, to end a situation, so as to furnish at once a stimulant and rest for the next number. But Dickens is dead.

A "SOCIETY QUEEN."

There has been a good deal of agitation here in literary circles over the fact that a certain lady, who gave popular receptions and organized and managed a convivial club, has for years held improper relations with Col. Harry Van Rensselaer, who, she claimed, was her uncle, and whom she affectionately called "Uncle Harry." She was known as Mrs. Fennimore, a prettier name than the one she bore fifteen years ago, when she worked in a printing office down town. Just how she got into literary society here four years ago, nobody seems exactly to know; but "Uncle Harry" was well known and much liked for his rare culture, his talent, and his bluff heartiness, and when she began to give receptions in her beautiful house (where "Uncle Harry" lived), she was soon as well known and as much liked. Nobody asked many questions. All the best known writers in the city gathered in her fine parlors—journalists, novelists, poets, playwrights, actors, musicians, mayors and senators—spouted their recitations, exchanged their witticisms, sang their songs and drank her wine. Mrs. Fennimore was always delightful. A brilliant woman, witty and amiable, a poet, a musician, author of a play or two, incredibly suave, immensely clever, she knew how to charm her guests and make them come again. I have met a host of interesting people there. She took special delight in gathering young girls around her, and organizing them into a phalanx of "sweetness and light." Many of the most attractive belles of the city have been under her protection, and are, I suppose, none the worse for it. But it is now generally understood that Mrs. Fennimore and Uncle Harry live together in the residence he presented to her; that Uncle Harry is not a relative of hers, but is the husband of a lady and father of children in another part of the city; that Uncle Harry has given to her several houses, of which she collects the rents; and that it is a sad case all around. A hundred or two ladies and gentlemen who have accepted her hospitality during the last five years, and have enjoyed it undeniably, are now mad as a wet hen and claim that they have been imposed on; and they imprecate and call Uncle Harry hard names, and say that he might at least have been more discreet and lived in another house. So there are sore heads all along the skirmish line, and our literary society is silently weeping over its sawdust doll.

IN CONCLUSION.

It will be remembered that Mrs. May Roper, daughter of "Jenny June" Croly, and wife of Lieut. Roper of the navy, died during the summer in Maine, whither her parents had taken her to prolong her life. Her husband was in command of a ship on the coast of China, and for a month affectionate letters, two or three a week, continued to come from him to her. The day the cable brought him news of her death he was ordered with his ship to the South Pacific. Mrs. Roper was not only intelligent and gifted in many ways, but she was a most joyous and sunny-hearted little lady, and her death seems a pitiful tragedy.

Melville C. Smith, Jerome Fassler, ex-Secretary Windom, and others of the directors of the Broadway Underground railroad, have been in London and Paris this summer, getting "points" to strengthen their appeal to the legislature for an enlarged charter, to enable them to build four tracks instead of two. They have now returned here and sent over Gen. McAlpin, civil engineer, to examine the London underground road and make a specific report concerning the probable damage to property caused by vibration, etc. Mr. Fassler tells me that the president of that road assured him that, though their tunnel ran under blocks, under stores, hotels, churches, breweries, through cellars, close to kitchens, below the foundation of shaky brick walls hundreds of years old, they had never cracked a wall or had to pay a cent of damages. They expect the legislature to modify their character, enabling them to arcade Broadway its whole width below the surface, instead of tunneling it.

The Tribune building is the greatest newspaper headquarters in the world. Not only the Tribune, the Journal, and half a dozen other papers, are printed there; but occupying the rooms of the front building are representatives of the following papers, recording them in order from the eighth floor downward: Chicago Times, Pittsburgh Telegraph, Louisville Commercial, St. Louis Republican, Chicago Tribune, Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Louisville Courier-Journal, Peck's Sun, Omaha Bee, Kansas City Journal, Washington Republican, Denver News, Oregon News, Kellogg lists (1,311) papers, New Orleans Times-Democrat, Philadelphia Press, Kansas City Times, San Francisco Bulletin, San Francisco Call, Chicago Grazer and Baltimore American. These newspapers fill up the best rooms in the building.

BOSTON'S CELEBRATED CASE.

The Fight Over Mrs. Armstrong's Wealth Develops Some Interesting Facts Showing How Dangerous It Is for an Elderly Dame to Get the Mash.

BOSTON, Special Correspondence, Oct. 10.—A most curious, and what will prove a celebrated case, is now absorbing the entire attention of Bostonians in high and low circles. The facts which have already been brought to the surface read stranger than fiction, and, were they not sworn to, would scarcely gain credence. The names which figure most prominently in the case are Abigail Armstrong and Warren K. Blodgett. The former, for many years, was the "poor lone widder" of Gov. Armstrong, and is now sleeping peacefully in the grave; the latter is a gray-haired, middle-aged gentleman, who was once an impecunious provision dealer, but who loved the "widder," more for her money than for herself, and who is now fighting in court for about a million left by her, opposed by some twenty-eight heirs, who allege that she was not in her right mind when she gave her property to him, and that he had an undue influence over her during her life. A case similar to this has hardly been known in this country. It has been in court two weeks already, and it may be a month before it is concluded. Away back in the year 1812 Abigail met Samuel Armstrong, fell in love with him, and then became his wife. Samuel was a printer and publisher, and soon got rich—the greater part of his wealth, it was said, being made upon a book entitled Fanny Hill, which, had there been an Anthony Comstock at that time, would undoubtedly have been suppressed. He retired in 1823 upon $200,000, and interested himself in politics. He served four years in the board of aldermen, was lieutenant governor of the State from 1833 to 1835, and was acting governor after the election of Gov. John Davis to the United States senate, March 4, 1835. The year following he was elected mayor of Boston, and during his administration the court house in which the present case is now being tried was completed, and a fence built around the common. At that time the Armstrongs lived in an elegant mansion upon Beacon street, not far from the State house. It was a large establishment and magnificently fitted up, there being quite a retinue of servants, male and female. They entertained in a princely fashion, and the most noted people in the land were their guests. They kept horses and carriages, and in fact lived in the height of style. Mrs. Armstrong was quite good-looking, dressed always in the latest fashion, and was the acknowledged leader of Boston society. She was extremely well educated, was a good conversationalist, witty and entertaining. They "did" Europe several times, and were in fact the bluest of blue blood. In 1850 Mr. Armstrong, died leaving considerable property, and this, added to a large amount of money willed her by her father, made Mrs. Armstrong the owner of about half a million. It was Mr. Armstrong's desire that his relict should maintain the style after his death that she had been accustomed to before it; and, in obedience to this wish of her deceased husband, Mrs. Armstrong did so for five years. At the end of that time she made the acquaintance of Warren K. Blodgett, who was a smart, intelligent and good-looking man, and immediately got "mashed" upon him, although he was married and had a family.

THE SHREWD VERMONTER.

Blodgett was a Green mountain youth, who, when he was of age, borrowed $25, and came to Boston to seek his fortune. He managed to save up a little money, and started in the provision business, renting a store of Mrs. Armstrong. After a time he got acquainted with his landlady, who took a great interest in his affairs. Blodgett was shrewd and let her. She engaged him to collect her rents for her, paying him well, and also loaned him money. She invited him to call and see her at her house on Beacon street, and accordingly he made an evening call twice a week. In a short time he seemed to gain a wonderful influence over her, and she gave him the entire control of her immense estates and affairs, paying him 10 per cent for so doing. As his influence over her grew stronger, she began to make him presents, so he claims. She started off by giving him $14,000 worth of government bonds. It was done in this way: She ordered him to buy the bonds, which he did, charging 10 per cent for so doing. Then, soon after, she ordered him to sell them. For this he also charged 10 per cent. Then to cap all she made him a present of the money realized by their sale. Before many months had passed she made him another present, so he claims, of 100 shares of Northern railroad stock worth $10,000, and a little later she gave him 100 shares of the Boston & Albany railroad stock valued at $15,000. It seemed as if the poor deluded and infatuated old soul could not do enough for him, for she followed up these magnificent and princely gifts by again making him a present of eighty-two shares in the Boston & Providence railroad, and $14,000 worth of stock in the Boston & Maine road. Blodgett got 10 per cent commission when these shares were purchased. A short time after Mrs. Armstrong made the acquaintance of Blodgett, a great change was noticed in her by her friends. She became miserly to herself, her sisters and all her relatives, but was most generous to Blodgett, giving him presents of money and the stock before mentioned. She would half starve herself to save money to give to him, and it seemed as if it was her only happiness in life to give her money away to him alone. Blodgett was all the time getting 10 per cent commission upon her income, and managed to secure by this means alone about $20,000 a year. He got so wealthy at last that he moved into the next house to Mrs. Armstrong, which was worth $50,000. About 1877 she prepared her will in which she gave $5,000 each to her nephews and neices, a little more than that to her three sisters, and from $200,000 to $300,000 to Blodgett. This will, however, was never executed. By this will one of her neices, who had married her father's coachman, was entirely cut off.

MISERLY WITH MILLIONS.

As to her parsimonious habits, it was stated in evidence, that although she had an income of about $700 a day, she denied herself the bare necessities of life. She discharged her coachman and all her servants, and sold her horses and carriages. She did her own cooking, built fires, sifted ashes and would wash off the front door steps herself to the intense horror of her aristocratic neighbors. Her breakfast and supper consisted of old slices of bread, with butter, and a cup of tea; while for dinner she would add a small piece of steak. Between meals she would take a sip of brandy, furnished her by Blodgett to the extent of a gallon a month. The knives and forks she used were old battered-up steel ones unfit for use. Most of the crockery ware was chipped and cracked, the cups being without handles, while the cream jug was minus its nose. The carving knife was simply a blade, the handle being broken off. Gravy was served from an old cup. She put away the elegant dresses and costly jewelry she used to wear when her husband was alive, and for years she wore an old, shabby dress that originally cost $8. Her only extravagance in the way of dress was a 15-cent apron, which she was in the habit of showing to her relatives with great pride. Although wearing shabby clothes herself, she did not like to see her relatives wear poor clothing, and upon one occasion gave a relative $75 to buy some clothes with. She would buy heavy congress boots for $3, because they were cheap. Fires she would not have, as they were too expensive. On very cold days she would leave her room and go into the bath room, where there was a radiator, to get warm. She was continually making gifts of money and bonds to Blodgett, and at last she made over the whole of her estate to him on condition that he paid all the taxes on the property, and kept it in repair, beside paying the household expenses. Her household expenses, however, were only $1 a day; so it will be seen that Blodgett was getting a good thing. She placed $50,000 worth of bonds and stocks in Blodgett's hands, in trust for certain of her relatives, and promised that, upon her death, he should have the houses on Beacon street, and all the rest of her property. In 1882 Mrs. Armstrong died; leaving property worth $900,000. Search was then made among her effects.

A CURIOUS MEDLEY.

In an old hair trunk without a lock, kept in a front room, was found an immense collection of visiting cards, invitations and circulars. Among these were also found bonds and securities worth thousands of dollars, the greater part of them being negotiable. During the last years of her life Mrs. Armstrong insisted in keeping these valuables in the old trunk, where anybody could steal them. She had been asked to put them in a safe, but she answered that they had always been safe where they were, and would not listen to their removal. More papers and valuables were found in an old secretary in the dining rooms and in some bureau-drawers in her bedroom. Everything was in a chaotic state in the latter. A great many small bundles of rags were found tied up in two or three knots, with wrappers and string around them. In one bundle was found an old copper cent, in another a pair of diamond ear-rings worth $450, and in others were found a quarter of a pound of bird shot, porcelain buttons, silver coin, stumps of old matches, small scrip, an empty cotton spool, old advertising handbills, new gloves that had rotted away, several gold watches, and many other strange articles, some of value and some worthless. In an old trunk was found $650 worth of family silverware. Among the silver was a salver presented to Gov. Armstrong by the directors of the Tremont bank. In a lot of dirt in the back yard was found a valuable mosaic jewelry set, a family heirloom. The furniture of the house was old and moth-eaten, and seemed ready to fall to pieces, while some of the rooms had the appearance of not having been opened for many years. An incredible number of empty boxes were found all over the house, and old slippers were found stowed away in dark corners. There were only three linen sheets, and pieces of old clothes answered the purpose of towels. Ancient clothing, dresses, shawls, etc., once elegant and valuable, were found in out-of-the-way places almost eaten up by moths. In fact, the inside of the house and its contents was simply wreck and ruin. It has been proved that Blodgett received $360,000 from Mrs. Armstrong, which, with interest, amounts up to the present time to about $500,000. He is now fighting for the $900,000 left by her. The heirs are trying to prove that Mrs. Armstrong was not in her right mind when she gave her estate to Blodgett.

NELSE.

Coconnuts as a Diet.

The Fiji Times, in a recent article, calls attention to the immense utility of the cocoanut as an article of food, and the valuable qualities which it has for sustaining nutrition. The following instance is given in the case of a vessel that once left San Francisco with 400 passengers for Sydney, which, in consequence of running short of stores, had to put in at Samoa, where a large quantity of cocoanuts were obtained. During the remainder of the passage very heavy weather was encountered, in which the vessel became waterlogged, and only reached Sydney after a perilous journey of eighty days, during which time all the provisions ran short, and men, women and children were fed only upon cocoanuts, being at last reduced to one per diem for each adult. Notwithstanding the diet, not a life was lost, and not a single case of sickness occurred, the passengers landing in a healthy and well-nourished condition. In another instance, two men drifted in a whale boat on to Quails Island, where they remained for seven years before they were taken off. They had no food beyond a chance flying fish and cocoanuts, and yet when rescued were in excellent condition and had gained in weight.

LEFT!

A summer evening,
A low, square room,
One half moon-lighted
And half in gloom.

From out the stillness
A girl's voice floats,
And charms my soul
With its sad, sweet notes.

The music draws me,
With witchery sweet,
To lay my heart
At the singer's feet.

I pause a moment,
And, while I wait,
I hear the latch
Of the garden gate.

A shadow darkens
The moonlit square—
A touch falls soft
On the girl's bright hair.

A sudden silence—
A startled cry—
And they are happy!

FANNY AS A WRESTLER.

Or the Great Catch-as-Catch-Can Encounter to Be Seen Nightly in the Play of Fedora.

The Witch of Wall Street Subsides Into a Bowery Fortune Teller at Fifty Cents a Head.

NEW YORK, Special Correspondence, Oct. 12.—Mantell is a six-foot man, rather slim, but very supple and active, and weighs about 175 pounds. He is twenty-seven years old, and in excellent physical condition. Fanny Davenport is five feet ten, of a powerful and shapely build, weighs a 160 pounds, and her age is—not a point worth deciding in so beautiful a woman. She has ridded herself of so much fat that she, too, may be put down as in firstrate physical order. You have no doubt seen this actress for yourself, and I describe her appearance thus particularly, only because I wish to show her as she is just now. Physique tells in a wrestling match, such as that which I witnessed between Miss Davenport and Mantell. It was a catch-as-catch-can encounter, in the presence of a thousand spectators. They first grabbed each other round the shoulders, and hugged for a few seconds like bears. Then they struggled across the stage, bending and writhing with all their might, as though each was trying to bend the other to the floor. The next phase of the contest was an effort on the part of Mantell to break away, but he did not free himself from the enveloping arms (they were taperingly covered with Suede gloves reaching to the shoulder) without a persistent use of all his strength. And his freedom was brief. Miss Davenport caught him, from behind, lifted him nearly off his feet, and threw him down. First fall for the actress. Both were a good deal winded by the work; but there was half an hour of rest before the next round, and they came up smiling. This bout was brief, and scarcely fair, for the man used some violent language that took the pluck out of the woman. After five minutes of pulling and hauling over sofas and chairs, she went suddenly into a heap at his feet, clinging wildly to his legs. One fall for Mantell. The wrestlers were short of breath on facing each other for the third and final round. They clasped round necks and waists with manifest feebleness, and seemed to mutually lack the strength necessary for a decisive effort; but at length the man showed a wonderful access of vigor. He seized the woman by the throat, wrenched and flung her head this way and that, bent her form backward until it looked like a contortionist in a difficult feat, and then, quickly pulling her forward, slammed her on the floor. She lay there an instant, as though stunned. A winning fall for Mantell. But his antagonist went at him again, with a fury that was aimless and impotent. Then catching up a glass, she hastily drank the contents. It was drugged with a deadly poison. Her hold on Mantell relaxed, and she fell on a sofa, tumbled then to the floor, and died. But her demise does not prevent a repetition of the wrestling every evening, for the match is incidental to the dramatic part of Fedora, which she is now playing. Of course, there is dialogue between the characters personated by her and Mantell, but the physical portion of their performance has exactly the aspects of wrestling that I have described. Such an expression of emotion beats all that I have ever seen on the stage. If that athletic sort of love-making should be adopted in country villages, the front gates would inevitably be torn from their hinges, as though by cyclones.

ARTHUR'S DOUBLE.

We have a New Yorker who resembles President Arthur so closely as to be commonly mistaken for him. The likeness has existed for twenty years or more, and was a subject of comment among the acquaintances of the two men when there was less social difference between them than there is now. Bill Nathans was a shoemaker, with a shop of his own near the custom house, during the years that Arthur, before appointment as collector, held subordinate positions. They got shaved in the same barber shop, so Nathans tells me. A change of proprietorship gave the opportunity for a joke on the new owner. Nathans went in to have his face smoothed, told his name in order to identify his private cup, and, as it was broken, talked about ordering another. Just outside of the door, he met Arthur. They consulted briefly. Arthur went in, nodded familiarly, and took his place in a chair. The barber looked surprised at the customer who, apparently, was the same man who had a minute before been under his hands; but he had no time to make any comment before Arthur said:

"I've got a cup here—marked 'Nathans.' Don't you remember? You were speaking to me about a new one, yesterday."

"Yesterday, sir?" exclaimed the puzzled barber. "Didn't I shave you right now?"

"I haven't been in here since yesterday," was the cool reply.

The barber was not a total abstainer, and had no good reason to trust his own mind implicitly. A barely finished spree made him more than usually doubtful of his memory; but he was thoroughly alarmed by a mental condition that seemed to deprive him of the power to discriminate between two in a minute and a day. He shaved Arthur very thoughtfully, and that evening went to a temperance meeting to sign the pledge. The resemblance did Nathans no good, though it enabled him to gratify his vanity by posing in public places, and receiving nods and occasional hand-shakes under false pretenses. This form of amusement, however, proved costlier than it might seem at first thought. It was easy enough to fool casual acquaintances of the collector, but the sport took time that he could not spare from his small business, and so sank from employer to employe. The elevation of Arthur to the vice presidency entailed additional responsibility upon his counterpart, who thereupon undertook to keep up a proper shadow of dignity. This he did by dressing as nearly like Arthur as the obtainable information on that subject would permit. The expenses of his wardrobe were thus augmented far beyond what he could afford; but he kept at it resolutely, and showed himself in guises that satisfied his notion of what a vice president of the United States ought to be. Then came the further exaltation of Arthur, and still Nathans manfully, proudly bore the burden of similitude. He has informed himself of the president's styles of dress, of all the real or fancied changes in his demeanor in the direction of increased dignity, and especially in the alterations of the cut of his beard. Arthur's rather long side-whiskers had not been trimmed closely many days before Nathans learned of it, and had his own shortened in as nearly the same way as could be accomplished without actual measurements. He may be seen on afternoons sauntering on Broadway and lounging in places of weighty men's resort, getting a compensation for his bankruptcy in the stares which his likeness causes. He misses the mistaken greetings that he used to receive, for the improbability of the president going about in the city so unceremoniously prevents anybody from going further in their attentions than to remark the great resemblance; but on the other hand, there is more glory in merely looking like a president than in being taken for a collector. But there is a dread in his breast. He thinks that Arthur may let his whiskers grow without his finding it out in time to do likewise until it is too late to catch up.

THE WITCH OF WALL STREET.

"Seances by Grace Courtland, the Witch of Wall Street—Price 50 Cents." That was the new thing placarded on the front of a Bowery museum. Knowing that the roseate and pictured promise of double-headed babies usually are no more fully realized than by shriveled objects in alcohol, that the disporting mermaids of the painted canvas turn out to be jointures of stuffed monkey and fish skins, and that Barnum himself proudly takes the title of prince of humbugs, I was prepared to find a clumsy impersonation of the noted Wall street character. Grace Courtland has figured among the stock speculators in her own queer way. She contrived at the outset to mix herself into a row between Jay Gould and Jim Keene, and the disturbance at one time was much in the nature of a scandal. She undoubtedly learned some of the secrets of these two operators, and used her knowledge for cross purposes; but of course her connection with their affairs was not lasting, and her profits therefrom amounted to no more than enough to support her and a pretty daughter luxuriously for the time being. She lost her hold with the Gould people first, and then Keene undertook to use her to serve his vengeance. One scheme was to send her out lecturing, ostensibly on Wall street methods in general, but really on Gould's in particular. This project failed, not because the witch could not put together an interesting enough lecture, and deliver it skillfully, but for the potent reason that audiences could not be drawn together to hear it. Then she set out to write the same sort of matter for publication, but no newspaper with a decent reputation would use it. Thus the witchery of Mrs. Courtland did not serve to make a successful career for her in Wall street. After prolonging her income for awhile by selling points to credulous speculators, she dropped out of the street without being missed, taking her daughter along. They went westward, and the mother's application of a horse-whip to a young man who declined to marry the daughter was their latest public performance.

It was the genuine Grace Courtland that I found in a Bowery museum. All of these concerns have side-room traps for the unwary. In the worst of these places the visitor is enticed into an apartment devoted to some gambling swindle or other; but in those where the law is respected, or at least feared, the ante-chambers are commonly used by phrenologists or fortune tellers, who feel your bumps or forecast your future before you are aware of it, and then demand a fee with a cool impudence that makes you pay it. It was the door of such an annex that had the name of the Witch of Wall Street on it, and was 'tended by a man who told me that I would have to wait a few minutes, as she was engaged. I amused myself during this delay with the fat girl, whose marriage had not yet ceased to bring throngs to the house; with the man who has no epidermis, and can therefore stretch his unfastened skin to the extent of nearly covering his face by pulling the skin from his throat up over it; with a negro boy whose blackness is displaced by spots of Caucasian whiteness, making him look like a liver-and-white dog; and with a fluffy-haired young woman, who made herself as repulsive as the other curiosities, in spite of comeliness, by handling two snakes. Grace Courtland may not be perfectly beautiful, and yet she seemed so by contrast with these other exhibits. She struck me as a seasonable, October person—"a charmed moment poised between perfection and decay, the aftermath of yellowing green just touched with specks of gray." That is to say, prosily, she was a woman on the verge of getting over her beauty—I think she was fifty. Her face was regular and intellectual in its features, her eyes were dark and bright, and it did not take a great deal of powder and rouge to almost hide the age lines. She had a fine figure, and there was portly dignity in her bearing as she came to greet me. The room was about 4x6 feet, and that was hardly space enough for an ample style of politeness; but she managed to wave me to a chair beside a small table, and to seat herself facing me, without a disastrous disturbance of her velvet-robed dignity.

THE PRICE OF A POINTER.

"Half a dollar, please."

Notwithstanding the terseness of this demand, it somehow seemed to me that I must have misunderstood her—that the paltry sordidness of such a monetary transaction would prevent this lofty matron from having anything to do with it, and that the man outside the door was the proper recipient. I laid down the coin, however, and she pocketed it so quickly that the incongruity went right out of sight.

"I'm a woman of business," she said, "and that is why I am here. The managers of this museum offered me $500 a week, and I signed a contract for a month immediately. You don't believe that they pay me so much?"

A terrible fear arose in me that I had betrayed incredulity, and I hastily replied:

"Oh, that is a very reasonable figure, indeed—quite a bargain for the managers, I should say."

"True enough; for I turn all the fees over to them, and so they get their money back directly, beside securing me as an attraction."

Then she looked at my hand like a fortune teller, talked about its lines of life and so forth, told me with flattering recklessness what kind of a character I had, and at length remarked, with a drop of tone from high professional reserve down into friendly candor:

"I don't believe you care to have me tell your future fortune. You are too sensible to believe in such things. You'd rather I'd give you a point for the street. Would you buy a horse if I showed you a good one?"

That was asking, in Wall street language, whether I would follow her directions concerning some particular stock. My reply was that I had no aversion to betting on a sure thing.

"But I shall make you pay for it," said the witch with labored archness; "it ought to be worth $25 to you if I show you how to make a thousand?"

"So it would," I replied, "but my conscience wouldn't let me take advantage of you. Do you suppose I would allow you to sell me for only $25 knowledge which, if you were to use it yourself, would make you a wealthy woman? No, ma'am. You shall not sacrifice yourself on my account. Good afternoon."

As a matter of fact, Wall street is no longer dazzling to novices. The brokers are all there yet, with their hands eagerly held out for margins, but new victims do not come along to take the places of those who have been ruined, and business is very bad down there. This condition was shown all summer by the sudden dislike by most of the brokers for those costly Long Branch and Saratoga pleasures which, in previous seasons, they had so extravagantly purchased. They discovered that such indulgences were empty and foolish. Less ostentatious diversion, such as quiet rest in some uncrowded country place, or even staying in town, with an occasional afternoon or evening trip to Coney Island, was preferable. The same admirable desire to eschew wasteful follies is visible this fall. Still wines are discovered to be less hurtful than champagne; the cookery of table d'hote dinners is more wholesome than that of Delmonico's or the Hotel Brunswick, and it is better to wait for the theatrical entertainments until they are produced at the 75-cent theaters of Eighth avenue and the Bowery, after they have gained smoothness by repetition, rather than hurry to them in the Broadway houses, where the prices of parquet seats range from a nominal $1.50 to speculative and extortionate figures.

THE NEGRO AS A CATHOLIC.

A novel religious movement is that which aims to gather and multiply negro Roman Catholics in this city. To most of New Yorkers the colored religionist is a shouting Method at as a matter of course; but the fact is that about 2,000 of our resident blacks have been baptized in the Romish church. Some of these are from the larger Southern cities, but the majority are natives of Cuba or Bermuda. A church has been bought for them to meet in, and it is expected that converts will be numerous. Negroes have not been excluded from the white Catholic congregations, nor even repelled, and yet they have become scattered, so that many paid no attention to their religion.

"There's no denying," said the Rev. Father Burtsell, the priest who is to have charge of the negro church, "that the Irish, who constitute three-fourths of the Catholic membership in this city, are no lovers of colored folks. What do you think was the remark of a certain zealous and intelligent Catholic when asked to contribute to our fund? He said that he had no objection to missionary work among the negroes—their souls ought to be saved, and all that—but he saw an almost insurmountable obstacle in the confessional to their ever becoming true Catholics. It was his deliberate opinion the negro would not confess the truth if it was against himself. 'The African is a liar by nature, and no regeneration will alter that one characteristic,' he declared. It was no use to argue to him that his conclusion was altogether too sweeping. He firmly believed that every negro would lie to the priest in the confessional. I needn't assure you that I totally differ with that view of the race."

How Editorials Are Sometimes Made.

Of the late Mr. Sheahan, of the Chicago Tribune, an old newspaper man of that city says in the Inter-Ocean: "It was great fun to see or hear him and Medill get up an editorial. Sheahan would walk into Medill's room and break the silence by an ejaculation as to cheese. He would thunder at Medill to the effect that cheese wasn't appreciated—it was better than meat—more sustaining, more nutritious—went further and lasted longer. Medill would acquiesce cautiously, and the two old men would proceed to go over an editorial on the subject. 'Nothing better for lunch,' Sheahan would shout, 'than bread and cheese'—and 'a glass of beer,' Medill would suggest, or 'a bottle of wine,' from Sheahan, and the two would rub their knees and face each other and laugh in anticipation as they insisted at the tops of their voices that such a lunch was better and brainier than a dinner at the Palmer house. Then as Sheahan would get on his feet in an absorbed sort of way, Medill would say encouragingly, 'You do that, Sheahan.' And so it was day after day, except when Medill was absent, and then, without anybody understanding just how it was done, Sheahan's hand was found just where Medill's hand would have been."

FRIENDSHIP.

A ruddy drop of manly blood
The surging sea outweighs,
The world uncertain comes and goes,
The lover rooted stays.
I fancied he was fled—
And, after many a year,
Glowed unexhausted kindliness,
Like daily sunrise there.
My careful heart was free again;
O friend, my bosom said,
Through thee alone the sky is arched,
Through thee the rose is red;
All things through thee take nobler form,
And look beyond the earth;
The mill-round of our fate appears
A sun-path in thy worth.
Me, too, thy nobleness has taught
To master my despair;
The fountains of my hidden life
Are through thy friendship fair.

How They Regard Their Women—Zenana Work in Detail—Ceremonies and Traditions of the People.

The Missionary Field.

Among the most interesting features of the anniversary meetings during the recent Free Baptist conference in Minneapolis was the graphic account given by Mrs. L. C. Griffin of the native life and mission work in the Bengal presidency in Hindostan. Mrs. Griffin has been for years an active laborer in the East Indian field, especially in the zenana or women's department of evangelizing work, and though recently obliged to return to this country to recuperate her wasted health, is now expecting to sail on Saturday for her former field of labor and self-sacrifice. She is located at Midnapore, a town of some 70,000 people, situated in the great jungle or plain of the Ganges, some distance westerly from Calcutta, and inhabited by Brahmans, lower caste Hindoos, Mohammedans and some English. Describing her life there, she said:

CONSIDERATIONS OF CASTE.

The caste distinctions of India furnish the key to Indian society and customs, and, as they are essentially religious in their nature, are the most important element in the problem of successful evangelizing. The Brahmans are the highest caste, and are followed in order by the Kshatriyas, Vaisyas, Sudras, or members of the servile caste, and the Pariahs, or outcasts, who have no caste at all. The lines of demarcation between the several castes are very distinctly drawn, and are inflexible in their operation; a transition from one caste to another is unheard of. The Brahmans include all the educated men; men of other castes and the women of all castes are utterly without learning. Among them social amenities are found in the greatest perfection, and they monopolize the wealth of the country. They also include all the zemindars or landholders, owning the land as absolutely as any feudal lord, subject to a certain tithing in the nature of government fees. This land they sublet to tenants among the lower classes, manual labor being considered an ineffaceable disgrace by a Brahman. Mohammedans are also frequently found in the capacity of servants, especially as domestics about the houses of the aristocracy, though the influence of the Brahmanic religion makes itself felt even on them, the Moslems being more strict with their women here than elsewhere. Mission work is largely confined to the Brahmans, both because they are more fitted to receive it understandingly, and because their influence, once gained, is paramount with the lower classes, though the latter are reached in the ragged and jungle schools. The Pariahs are almost beyond reach, and but little work is done among them.

HOME LIFE ILLUSTRATED.

The domestic life of the Brahmans is peculiar to themselves, and in its customs and restraints very interesting to Caucasians. The houses are all of brick and a single story high, the walls very thick and neatly plastered and whitewashed, both inside and out. Their outward aspect is prison-like in the extreme, there being no windows upon the street, and only one door; the reasons of this architecture will appear hereafter. Within, the house is found to be built generally in quadrangular form about a courtyard, the prison rooms or zenana opening through doors and windows upon a surrounding veranda, which, during most of the year, is really the living apartment of the house. The houses are seldom neat or in good repair—the climate, predisposing to indolence, accounting for the former fact; while the explanation of the latter is found in the vast array of white ants and other destructive insects which abound on all sides and cause ruin everywhere.

The court yard is sometimes paved, but more generally floored sparsely with grass and extensively with earth and dirt. In the center is always placed the particular family idol, and around it are planted flowers and sacred trees, especially the pomegranate and the tulsic, a plant sacred peculiarly to women. Each house has also here its well or water tank for domestic supply; fountains are unknown, and the cooling sound of the falling spray never breaks upon the torrid air. The summer temperature here is something terrible, the thermometer often marking 95 deg. in a cool (?) room, as the lowest for six weeks at a time. The yearly range is about from 85 to 100 deg. in the shade. The furniture of the houses is generally of the simplest kind, consisting principally of matting, which answers all the purposes of tables, chairs and beds, of which, in the English sense, there are none. The meals are eaten from the floor, and with the time-honored implements, the fingers, the men eating first alone and the women and children afterward. The food is of a character well suited to the tropical climate, consisting mainly of rice, curry, dates, and other fruits. Flesh and fowl are rigidly eschewed as contrary to the Brahmanic dogma of the transmigration of souls. Fish, however, is freely partaken of, sub-aqueous life having no soul to migrate, according to the faith.

THE WOMEN.

The government of the house of the Brahman is strictly in the hands of the men; of the father during the youth of the family; of the eldest son when he marries. The sons always bring their wives homes to the parental roof, and as the number of families thus increases, additions are built to the house until the establishment often forms quite a village in itself. In this place the women are imprisoned, literally buried alive. The dead outer walls of the zenana are unpierced, save by one door, and this merely opens into a room communicating with the inner court, but which the Brahman women never enter. From the day of their marriage, which is at a very early age, their eyes never behold more of the outer world than the narrow expanse of sky and cloud which looks down upon them between the stern walls of their prison home. No men are allowed to enter the house except the members of the family and the priest, except upon very rare occasions, and then unseen by the zenana women. There are a very few times when the child-wife is permitted, after marriage, to visit her father's house or the sacred temple. Then the zenana women are all hustled out of the way and locked up securely while the bearers bring in the palanquin, and set it down in the court, retiring immediately after. The wife is then released and placed in the palanquin, which is locked tightly, and wound about several times with a bright scarlet cloth, so as to prevent the occupant from peeping out between the slats. The bearers then return and carry their burden to her destination, when they again retire until she has been taken out, had her visit, and been reimprisoned for her ride homeward. The scarlet wrapping of the palanquin serves as a warning to passers-by to restrain their curiosity, but so infrequently are wives thus permitted to go abroad, that its bright color is a rarity upon the streets.

HOW THEY LIVE AND DIE.

Thus cut off from all intercourse with their fellow creatures, and unable to read or write, the life of the Brahman women can be easily conceived. Married at ten years (for spinsterhood is abominable), mothers at twelve, they are faded and old at the beginning of their fifth lustrum, and die of sheer age at about thirty. Their time is passed most aimlessly in the care of their children and the mysteries of the toilet. They dress, as a rule, richly, especially in the matter of jewels. Diamonds and pearls are the favorite ornaments. Bracelets and anklets adorn their arms and legs, and nose rings, finger rings and toe rings are abundant; but, by a queer contrast, they all go barefoot, sandals being arrogated to their own exclusive use by the men.

Numerically, women are minus quantities in India. When a proud father enumerates his family to his friends he only counts the sons. His daughters are hailed at their birth with disgust, for there is no family honor in their being, and their marriage implies no inconsiderable expense for dowry; in fact, the innocent unfortunates are lucky if the father does not cast them out into the jungle to die of exposure or to be devoured by passing carnivora. Female infanticide is a very common crime all through India. Yet the hardest lot of the Brahman woman, perhaps, falls upon her with her widow's weeds. To be sure, the atrocious suttee, or widow burning, is no longer permitted by the English law; but, instead, the poor creatures are subjected to great penalties for presuming to survive their lords. They may not have a mat to sleep upon, but must rest their bones upon the bare earth, and are forced to eat an inferior quality of rice, less fish and curry, and are condemned to two literal fasts of twenty-four hours each, a mouth during life. They are the slaves, the menials, of the family, and can never be released but by death.

RELIGIOUS CUSTOMS.

The Hindoos of Bengal and Orissa are Brahmans in religion, Budhism having its base further east in the peninsula. The Brahmans as a caste are monogamous, except in the class called Kuleen Brahmans, where polygamy is not only allowable, but is quite extensively practiced. To procure the marriage of a daughter into the Kuleen class is an honor much sought after and highly prized, and an unusually heavy dowry always accompanies the child wife. The peculiar doctrine of the transmigration of souls which distinguishes the Brahman faith, reacts upon their daily regimen, excluding therefrom all forms of lunged animals and making it a crime to kill even noxious animals, birds and snakes. Monkeys and cattle and elephants are regarded as objects of worship, and the deadly cobra and viper are passed by unmolested as sacred, though supposed to be inhabited only by the unhappy souls of women. The fakirs (pronounced fawkeers), the beggars of India, when refused alms by the English, will always curse them as "miserable flesh-eating Christians," their vocabulary containing no more opprobrious epithet. These fakirs, by the way, are an anomalous class, half natural beggar and half religious enthusiast, who subsist upon the charity and fears of the community. A man of any caste who will do a certain amount of severe penance, such as sleeping upon sharp spikes or over hot coals, keeping perpetual silence, or taking part in the ceremonies of Juggernaut, becomes thereby an object of worship and, if inclined, a fakir. The Hindoo religion imposes no especial obligation to care for the sick or decrepit; hence there are no asylums nor infirmaries in India except such as have been established by the English, and among the higher classes the old people are well and even affectionately cared for by the children, and this duty is enforced by the priesthood. Each house among the Brahmans has a special priest, who exclusively visits it and conducts the religious services before the family idol. These men are, as a rule, intelligent, and respectful and kind to their own people and to the missionaries, but their ceremonies and many of their dogmas are revolting and obscene.

Somewhat in the nature of the public shrines which stand upon the thoroughfares of devout Catholic countries, there are found upon the streets and roads of Bengal small brick temples containing idols, before which the wayfarer may prostrate himself in devotion as he hastens on his journey.

MARRIAGE CEREMONIES.

There are what may be called two marriages in the history of every Brahman wife; one, which is really the plighting of troth, at the average age of five or six years, and the other, the real nuptials, at ten or twelve. During this interval the girl is kept carefully guarded, in her father's house, from the outer world, as afterward in her husband's zenana; and should the husband die, she becomes a widow, exactly as though the final ceremony had been performed. I have taught widows not over seven years of age. The Mohammedans have a somewhat peculiar marriage, which may be not inaptly described as "looking through a glass darkly." The husband and wife (to be) are seated on a raised platform, with a screen between them, hiding each from the other; at the proper time the screen is slightly raised, and discloses a horizontal mirror, in which their furtive glances for the first time discover the beauties and deformities of their future helpmeets. The marriage ceremonies of the Brahmans I have never seen, but have often heard, and they are described as mere orgies, feasting and carousing, and degrading in the extreme.

ZENANA WORK.

It is easy now in Midnapore and many other Indian cities for missionary women to gain access to the zenanas, wealthy men often soliciting the teachers to visit them. But in the beginning it was very difficult to get this permission; and that it ever was obtained is due to the fancy work, embroidered slippers, caps, etc, which the missionary women made. Their elegance, and the fact that they were made by women, excited the admiration of the babies or native gentlemen, whose curiosity soon got the better of their superstition, as did their ambition of social custom; and thus the needle opened the doors upon the most heart-grinding captivity in the world. Though the Hindoos are bigoted, yet they were more easily impressed with the policy of educating their women, and reading, writing and the scriptures quickly followed the needle in the curriculum. The instruction is given, of course, in the zenanas, and by women, either native or white; but each new scholar becomes soon a teacher in turn, and thus the work goes on in an ever increasing ratio. Most of the teaching is in the Bengalee tongue, though some English instruction is given, especially in the schools, and some evangelizing is carried on among the Mohammedans in Arabic. The zenana women are ready scholars, and are particularly bright in studies depending upon memory. Mathematics and other branches requiring much use of the reasoning faculties are found to perplex them a good deal. Geography is difficult for them, also, as it can well be imagined it would be for those whose whole world since infancy had been a narrow court-yard and its encompassing walls. In composition they are very apt, often learning to write very good letters in eight months. Their progress in Christianity is necessarily slow. They are hampered by their traditional faith and by the disgrace which custom heaps upon them if they are baptized, that is, they lose caste then forever. Nevertheless, some of them in my department have become professing Christians and abide the consequences heroically. We do not seek their baptism, however, preferring to have them retain their caste for the sake of the good they can do in the household.

SOME SUGGESTIONS.

The Hindoos can never become civilized, according to our standard, until they shall lose their old religion. This faith is so interwoven with the tissue of their everyday life that they are never free from it for a moment. By its influence they still plow with an iron-shod stick, reap with a sickle and thresh the grain beneath the feet of oxen. It gives them no idea of right and wrong, according to our standard. It inculcates child marriages and the terrors of widowhood; it fosters female infanticide by its doctrine of female depravity and worthlessness. In short it is a vast improvement over fetichism and Parseeism, but it falls short of the real needs of mankind, and it is only through this foreign missionary work and its active support that these poor, benighted, down-trodden and heart-broken sisters of ours can ever be lifted out of this utter darkness into the light of truth and happiness.

Ben Butler and the Baby.

Macon (Ga.) Telegraph: Going to New York some years since, in company with Col. John Screven of Savannah, we entered a sleeper at Washington City. Passengers were taking their places, and in a few moments General Butler came in, accompanied by his wife. She was a rather dressy person of her age, and carried in her arms a black-and-tan terrier of rare blood, dressed with gay collar and ribbons. Just after them came a negro girl, just such an one as may be met half a dozen times on any block in a Southern city, bearing in her arms a child about eighteen months of age. The little fellow was yelling with all the strength of a lusty pair of lungs, and the nurse, though kind and patient, failed to soothe him with caresses and soft words. Gen. Butler took him, and the youngster screamed louder and kicked more vigorously. The general tried to tell him baby tales. He fondled him, dandled him on his knee, and sung the entire libretto of Mother Goose, from "Hi, Diddle, Diddle," to "Ride a Cock Horse to Banbury Cross," and still the youngster yelled, and would not be comforted. Finally, clasping him closely, the general, with great good humor, said: "Young man, I have coaxed you and sang to you in vain; now you will have to kick and yell it out." The screams of the little fellow became less piercing, his kicks subdued in vigor, and finally he sobbed himself to sleep. His sorrow had been "washed away in transient tears." Upon inquiring, we learned that the child was that of Mrs. Ames, the daughter of Gen. Butler, and had been that night parted from his mother for the first time. The patience, kindness and good humor displayed by Gen. Butler made us think better of him.

THE BEST IS GOOD ENOUGH FOR ME.

I quarrel not with Destiny,
I make the best of everything—
The best is good enough for me.

Leave Discontent alone, and she
Will shut her mouth and let you sing,
I quarrel not with Destiny.

I take some things, or let 'em be—
Good gold has always got the ring;
The best is good enough for me.

When Fate insists on secrecy,
I have no arguments to bring—
I quarrel not with Destiny.

The fellow that goes "haw" for "gee"
Will find he hasn't got full swing.
The best is good enough for me.

One only knows our needs, and he Does all of the distributing.
I quarrel not with Destiny;
The best is good enough for me.

The semi-annual conference of the Mormon church is in session at Salt Lake and Apostle Cannon reported a membership in Utah of 127,290; families 23,006; births in last six months, 2300, of which number the males exceeded females by an even hundred; marriages 339; new members admitted, 23,040; deaths, 781. The church organization has twelve apostles, 58 patriarchs, 3885 seventils, 3153 high priests, 11,000 cloirs, 1509 bishops and 4,400 deacons, Arizona has a membership of 2262, Idaho not reported but it is about double that of Arizona. The new converts from the Southern States are being colonized in Colorado.

The theory that inmates of insane asylums should be required to work is gaining ground, and it is not improbable that many of the asylums will eventually become nearly self-supporting, instead of being as now, a very heavy tax upon the public. Of course, many of their inmates are too insane to work, but perhaps more than half of the whole number in confinement are capable of engaging in some useful employment several hours every day. It is the opinion of the best experts in insanity that agreeable work is one of the most valuable curative agents for the insane, and to devise employment suited to the different patients is likely to soon become an important problem for the managers of our insane asylums.

Patrick O'Donnell, now in custody, charged with the murder of James Carey (the informer at the trial of the Phœnix Park murderers) on board a British vessel at sea on July 29th, is about forty-eight years of age, and is a native of Derrybeg in Donegal, Ireland. He lived in America from 1850 to 1879, served in the federal army during the civil war, and afterwards kept a small public house on the Canadian frontier. He is also said to have lived in Philadelphia and to have left a wife there. On his departure from the Cape at midsummer a girl whom he had met in Londonderry accompanied him, and was with him on board the Melrose when he committed his crime. It is claimed that O'Donnell did not know Carey before he started for the cape; he was regarded generally as a quiet and sober man.

There is a passion for office in England, as in the United States, and the crowd of applicants is constantly increasing in England. The British civil service commissioners' report for the past year states that they have examined 36,400 applicants, as against 24,243 in the previous twelve months. Only 5490 have obtained certificates, which is 550 less than in 1881. Candidates enough passed the examination to supply our men for every vacancy. Moreover, the glut of candidates was most marked in the examinations where a mere smatter of learning suffices, and where the pay obtainable is preposterously low. It is therefore demonstrated that appointings under civil service rules increases rather than diminishes the rage for office. It is so in England where civil service rules have been in operation for some years; and probably will be the same in the United States, as soon as the requirements for office come to be better understood.

Considerable commotion has been caused among the colored people by a recent decision of the United States supreme court in the civil rights cases. Its effect is simply to confine the application of the act of congress of March 1, 1875, to the equal rights of all citizens in every state in regard to contracts, to the holding and conveyance of property, to proceedings in courts, to personal protection, and to holding office. In other words, the act cannot be construed as securing to any citizen any social privileges to which his position among his fellows does not entitle him. The unconstitutionality of the portions of the act relating to social privileges has long been affirmed by the best lawyers, and the decision of the court will not change things very much. Comparatively few negroes, even in the first enjoyment of their freedom, become more disagreeable than many white people unable to understand their proper social position. The negroes in many states are numerous enough to have caused great trouble by insisting upon their rights under the law of 1875. Their failure to do this encourages the belief that the proper relations between the two races will adjust themselves from time to time without legislation.

The West has drawn the young blood from many localities in the New England states. The condition of sections of Vermont, as described by the Rutland Herald, will apply with equal truth to portions of Maine, New Hampshire and Massachusetts. The Herald says: "There are many deserted farms and decayed towns in southern Vermont; at least, that is the testimony given us by an intelligent farm-bred lawyer who recently personally visited the towns that touch both sides of the Green Mountains from the Massachusetts line to Addison county. The woodland has so encroached upon these deserted farms that our friends is confident that there is more woodland to-day in the mountain towns of Vermont than there has been at any previous time in the past forty years. In the old counties of Bennington, Windham, Windsor and Rutland there are many deserted farms and decayed towns along both sides of the mountain range, and these deserted farms are not being reoccupied by any returning wanderer, although most of the towns are places of much natural beauty and attractiveness. The Herald might have stated that farms are for sale in most of the New England states at for less prices than the cost of houses, barns and other buildings upon them, not to mention stone walls, etc. Whether the situation in the localities will ever change for the better is a matter for conjecture.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

Washington News Notes.

Dr. T. H. Dean, the curator of the department of fisheries, has just returned from the London exposition. He states that the problem is now what to do with the net receipts of the exposition, which will probably exceed $200,000. As yet no agreement has been reached as to the proper use of the funds, but if the English authorities can agree upon any scheme, it will perhaps provide for some permanent form of fisheries museum or laboratory for research upon the marine life of Great Britain or both. The jury has awarded to the United States exhibitors forty-eight gold medals, forty-seven silver, and twenty-nine bronze, beside twenty-four diplomas, and seven special prizes. Eighteen of the gold medals are sent to the United States fish commission.

The Criminal Record.

Two men giving the names of William Bracken and Frank Holmes, arrived at Halifax, N. S., on the 11th inst., and put up at the Parker house. It is believed that they came from the states. They gave no names to the hotel people, and paid a week's board in advance. Detective Powers watched them and searched their rooms in their absence, and discovered dynamite, which was secured. He then arrested the two men. Both the prisoners deny the charge against them and claim the protection of the American flag. They are evidently Irish Americans, and denied knowing each other. Both are young men. Holmes was asked what packages were in the valises, and replied he did know, they did not belong to him. One of the valises contained 100 pounds of dynamite of a powerful nature. Dynamite was found in the trunk and valise of Bracken.

PENSIONS.

COMMISSIONER DUDLEY'S REPORT.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19.—The report of the commissioner of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, shows that there were 303,658 pensioners on the rolls at the end of the fiscal year. During the year the names of 76 whose pensions had been dropped previously were restored to the roll, making 38,958 pensions added during the year, an excess of 10,645 over the preceding year. The average annual value of each pension is $106, and the aggregate annual value of all pensions was $32,245,192, an increase of $200,409. The amount paid for pensions was $60,064,009, exceeding the annual value by several millions of dollars. The bulk of this excess was on account of arrears of pensions covering the period prior to the allowance of claims. The appropriation for salaries and fees to pension agents was exhausted, and there is a balance due agents. The whole number of claims filed since 1861 was 886,137, of which 51,938 were allowed. During the same time $62,107,237 were paid out for pensions and costs of disbursements. The percentage allowed of army claims filed has decreased from 76 7 per cent in 1867 to 39 4 per cent in 1880. The report next dwells upon the difficulties experienced in disciplining the large additional clerical force allowed by congress to settle arrears of pension cases. So large an addition to the force of the office consumed time and attention of more experienced examiners and clerks. Yet, so well was the work of instructing new clerks pushed forward, that they were soon efficient. Not only were all claims involving arears examined and proper calls made for evidence, but it was done so rapidly that like examinations and calls for testimony of one character or another were made in upwards of 100,000 claims filed since the arrears. Those entitled to arrears have been shown to default in meeting offers for the prompt settlement of their claims by furnishing testimony required, while those whose claims were filed during three years subsequent to the arrears act have not been very generally afforded even opportunities to prove their claims until the past year; yet they have so responded that but 70 per cent of the claimants of this class are in default upon calls made upon them for evidence, while those of the other class entitled to arrears are in default, for some cause, in 83 per cent of the number pending. This stacment is made in explanation of the fact that that so many claims have been allowed which were filed subsequently to the arrears period, while so large a number filed at an earlier period remained unsettled when they were presumably entitled to precedence.

CAUSES OF DELAY.

An examination showed 204,290 cases were delayed by claimants, 9,935 by the adjutant general's office, 2,902 by the surgeon general's office, and 23,523 by the pension office; but a large percentage of the cases delayed in the pension office are in the hands of special examiners or boards of review. A large part of the report is devoted to a renewal of recommendations made last year touching the amendment of the pension laws. The commissioner says:

> The law recently enacted making it a misdemeanor both on the part of the pledger and pledgee to hypothecate a pension certificate for debt, is already bearing fruit by putting a stop to this practice in large cities and lessening the demand for the duplicate certificates and permits. Another year of aggressive enforcement of that law will effectually end the evils complained of. Attention is called to the fidelity and ability with which the unprecedented disbursements of the bureau have been made by agents for the payment of pensions, an average of $3,357,331 having been disbursed from each of the eighteen agencies at an annual expense of $16,008, and without the loss of a dollar to the government or complaint of delay from beneficiaries.

Of the special examination system the commissioner speaks in commendatory terms, and says he will be disappointed if the saving to the government effected by this division will not be sufficient to defray the costs of its maintenance. He does not think it incumbent upon the government to be at any further expense in endeavoring to settle Indian pension claims when the result of the special commission sent out to the Indian Territory are considered. The resolution of the senate calling for a list of all pensioners necessitated the employment of the whole clerical force of several pension agencies in its preparation, and the report was handed in just before the adjournment of congress, but remained untouched at the government printing office until a recent date. When complete the report will consist of seven octavo volumes about 550 pages each, closely printed matter, and it is urged that congress provide for the widest possible circulation of the report. The secretary is asked to recommend that the salaries of the chief review board of special examination division, eastern, middle, western, southern and old war and navy divisions be each advanced to $2,500, and those of their assistants to $2,000 each, and that of the chiefs of other divisions to $2,250 per annum. Of the clerical force the commissioner says if claimants will do their part by responding to the calls for evidence, present force can easily settle cash enough to expend, during the incoming fiscal year, the full amount of the available appropriation. He expresses belief that all claims now outstanding will be disposed of by July 1, 1884, and trusts evidence may be forthcoming to enable the office to accomplish this much-to-be-desired end, so that the "high-water mark" in annual expenditure for pensions may be speedily known. The report concludes with a graceful complimentary reference to the effective labors of subordinates.

Indictment of O'Donnell.

O'Donnell has been indicted on the charge of murdering Carey. O'Donnell pleaded not guilty, and the trial was postponed to Nov. 21. Sullivan read an affidavit of the prisoner's solicitor that the solicitor of O'Donnell at Cape Colony had cabled that there were important wittnesses there who could be called to testify in the case. Attorney General James stated that he would not oppose the application for the postponement of the trial if the names of witnesses were inserted in the affidavit and the drift of evidence to be given by them indicated. After remarks by Judge Denman, he decided to postpone the trial. Previous to Sullivan's application for postponement, O'Donnell was brought into court, and, in response to a question of the judge as to the charge of murder preferred against him, pleaded "not guilty" in a careless and indifferent manner. Gen. Roger A. Pryor, O'Donnell's American counsel, was in court, seated behind the junior counsel. He was an object of much attention on the part of the spectators. Luxuries and food of the best kind are daily sent O'Donnell from a tavern adjacent to the prison. Macinery, an Irish lawyer, is coming to London to assist in the defense of O'Donnell.

Judge Kidder's Successor.

Washington, Special.—A lengthy petition has been received from citizens of Dakota, asking the appointment of the Hon. Hugh J. Campbell as judge of the supreme court in place of the late Chief Judge Kidder. Gov. Ordway, who by the way, has great weight with the president in the matter of appointments, has recommended Judge Campbell's appointment, also State Senator Fuller of Belvidere, Ill., is still here urging his case, but no sign has yet been given as to who will be the man. It is argued by the Dakota people, as against Fuller and all others from the states, that the bar of the territory is now amply able to furnish all material for their future judges. It seems that these representations have made some impression at the white house.

Territorial Appointments.

Washington Special: Several appointments are soon to be made for the territories. It is doubtful whether Gov. Newell of Washington Territory, will return to his post, or if he does whether he will long retain his position. Gentlemen who have lately visited a number of the territories report a very deep-seated feeling against the selection of eastern lawyers and politicians for the federal offices. Those gentlemen returned strongly impressed with the unsoundness of the policy which distributes the broken-down politicians and place-hunters of the east over these growing western communities, each one of which could furnish men thoroughly fitted, so far as ability is concerned, for any federal position in the territory. The prejudice against outside appointees is rapidly growing, and has in fact already reached a point where most of them are powerless for good.

A SURPRISING DECISION.

The United States Supreme Court Pronounces the Civil Rights Act Unconstitutional.

DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 15.—A most important decision rendered by the supreme court of the United States was that in the five cases commonly known as the civil right cases, which were submitted to the court on printed arguments about a year ago. The titles of these cases and States from which they come are as follows:

No. 1. United States against Murry Stanley. From United States circuit court, district of Kansas.

No. 2. United States against Michael Ryan. From United States circuit court, district of California.

No. 3. United States against Samuel Nichols. From United States circuit court, Western district of Missouri.

No. 26. United States against Daniel D. Singleton. From United States circuit court, Southern district of New York.

No. 28. Richard A. Robinson and Wife against The Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company. From United States circuit court, district of Tennessee.

These cases were all based on the first and second sections of the civil rights act of 1875, and were respectively prosecutions under that act for not admitting certain colored persons to equal accommodations and privileges in inns or hotels, in railroad cars and in theaters. The defense set up, in every case, the alleged unconstitutionality of the law. The first and second sections of the act, which were parts directly in controversy, are as follows:

First—All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of accommodations, advantages, fare and privileges at inns, public conveyances on land and water, theaters and other places of amusement, subject only to conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

Second—Any person who violates the first section shall be liable to forfeit $500 for each offense, to be recovered in civil action, and also to a penalty of from $500 to $1,000 fine, or imprisonment from thirty days to a year, to be enforced in criminal prosecutions. Exclusive jurisdiction is given to the district and circuit courts of the United States in cases arising under the law. The rights and privileges claimed by, and denied to colored people in these acts, were full and equal accommodations in hotels, in ladies' cars on railroad trains, and in dress circles in theaters. The court, in a long and carefully-prepared opinion by Justice Bradley, holds:

First—That congress had no constitutional authority to pass the sections in question, under either the Thirteenth or Fourteenth amendment to the constitution.

Second—That the Fourteenth amendment is prohibitory upon the States only, and that legislation referred to therein as to be adopted by congress for enforcing that amendment is not direct legislation on a matter respecting which States are prohibited from making or enforcing certain laws ordering certain acts, but is corrective. Legislation necessary or proper for counteracting and redressing the effects of such law or laws that in forbidding States, for example, to deprive any person of their liberty or property without due process of law, and giving congress power to enforce prohibition, it was not intended to give congress power to provide due process of law for the protection of life, liberty, and property, which would embrace almost all subjects of legislation, but to provide modes of redress for counteracting the operation and effect of State laws obnoxious to prohibition.

Third—That the thirteenth amendment gives no power to congress to pass the sections referred to because that amendment relates only to slavery and involuntary servitude which it abolished and gives congress power to pass laws for its enforcement. That this power only extends to the subject matter of the amendment itself namely, slavery and involuntary servitude and necessary incidents and consequences those conditions; that it has nothing to do with different races or color, but refers to slavery. The legal equality of different races, and classes of citizens being provided for in the fourteenth amendment, which prohibits States from doing anything to interfere with such equality; that it is no infringement on the thirteenth amendment to refuse to any person equal accommodations and privileges in an inn or place of public entertainment however it may be a violation of his legal rights; that it imposes upon him no badge of slavery or involuntary servitude, which is simply some sort of subjection of one person to another and incapacity incidental thereto, such as inability to hold property, to make contracts, to be parties in court, etc., and that if the original civil rights act, which abolished these incapacities, might be supported by the thirteenth amendment, it does not therefore follow that the act of 1875 can be supported by it.

Fourth—That this decision affects only the validity of the law in the States, and not in the Territories or District of Columbia, where the legislative power of congress is unlimited, and it does not undertake to decide what congress might or might not do under the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and amongst the several States, the law not being drawn with any such power.

Fifth—That, therefore, it is the opinion of the court that the first and second sections of the act of March 1, 1875, entitled "An act to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights," are unconstitutional, and judgment should be rendered upon indictments accordingly.

At the conclusion of the reading of Justice Bradley's opinion, which occupied more than an hour, Justice Harlan said, under ordinary circumstances and in an ordinary case, he should hesitate to set up his individual opinion in opposition to that of his eight colleagues, but in view of what he thought the people of this country wished to accomplish, what they tried to accomplish and that they believed they had accomplished by means of this legislation, he must express his dissent from the opinion of the court. He had not had time since hearing that opinion to prepare a statement of his grounds of dissent, but he should prepare and file one as soon as possible, and in the meantime desired to put upon record this expression of his individual judgment.

The Eulogy of a Good Man.

From the Albany Journal.

"Dutch Hank," said a gambler of prominence in Albany to-day to a Journal reporter, "was not only the best hand at poker who ever antied up in a big game but he was high-toned and straight. You could shut your eyes if you were sitting in with him without running the risk of being turned over by crooked work. They tell me he piled up a snug little fortune of $20,000. I've seen him with half that coin in his fist, for he always traveled with a big boodle to back his hand. He'd discount an iceberg for coolness, he would. The little Dutchman would drop $10,000 and $20,000 at a sitting without winking his eye, and when dead broke would get up with a story that would make a horse laugh. That was one of the reasons he was so clever with cards, you could never sicken him of the game, no matter how steep it was or how bad they gave it to him in the neck. It's a pretty frigid rooster who will see $20,000 go into the hole and never peep. That was the stuff Dutch Hank was made of square? A fairer hand never cut for a deal. But you couldn't do him up on any racket that was ever invented. Although he never depended on anything but his own hand and skill to carry him through, he was a cleaner to tumble to a sniggle. Nobody ever downed him on a cold deck or a fancy shuffle. Once he ran afoul of a sharper from Chicago, who had been making himself a millionaire at the expense of the best of us. Dutch Hank tackled him in the Brower house, New York. That was his hang out on his periodical voyages to the metropolis. Well, the Chicagoan was slicker than a wizard. Hank held cracking good fists and didn't want for luck when he drew to fill, but somehow or other the chap from Chicago raked in the pile in the finest style of the art. Dutchy only made a face or two, and took his gruel. He had dropped a couple of thousand. The Chicagoan, whenever a pot came his way coolly pulled it over, and piling one bill on the others held it down with a little gold weight. It was a pretty little ornament with a diamond on the top. The game kept on, Hank being the loser at every turn. Finally, before opening his hand he said: "My faind, shust sposen you put dot shiner into your pocket. Dot diamond he hurts my eyes. I vos blind in von already and can't see out of the odder." Hank meant that he wanted the diamond weight removed. The Chicagoan remonstrated, but Hank insisted in his own good-natured way, saying he couldn't play until the "shiner" was put out of sight. He carried his point of course. From that point luck changed Dutch Hank quit the game the winner of nearly $10,000. The weight used by the Chicago gambler was an ingenious reflector, so placed that it revealed his opponent's hand. He read the reflection with a magnifying glass, which he used on the pretense of being near sighted. Dutch Hank was the first man to tumble to the trick on which the Chicagoan had won $300,000 or $400,000."

LATE MARKET REPORT.

MINNEAPOLIS.

WHEAT—This market showed considerable activity at the close yesterday, and prices were stronger all round. There was some inquiry for No. 1 hard at $1.02 spot, an advance of ½c, and $1.02½ was offered for November. For December No. 1 hard in 5,000 bu lots, $1.03 was freely offered, but sellers did not seem inclined to let go. The same was offered for November in similar lots. Holders asked 1c more for futures. No. 1 Northern was wanted at 91c December, and 90c was offered for spot. There was a very fair amount of business done in samples at a wide range. Two cars of frozen wheat were sold at 81c, and one car No. 1 regular by sample at 98c. Three cars of No. 1 Northern brought 91½c, and December sold at 93c. with transit. Among the sales were 1 car sample at 91c f. o. b. and 1 car sample at 98c. The market closed steady and firm.

FLOUR—Quotations: Patents, $6@6.40; straights, $5@5.40; first bakers', $4.80@5.10; second bakers', $4.50@4.80; best low grades, $2.50@3; red dog, $1.60@2. The Boston market is reported as follows: Best patents, $7.30@7.45; straights, $6.80@6.90; first bakers', $5.75@5.90; red dog, $2.70@2.80, in sacks. The market is fairly active and low grades are in good demand, but prices are not growing better. Several heavy sales have been made this week, but at low rates.

OATS—There was some inquiry for oats at 30c for No. 2 white, and 29c for No. 2 mixed. Holders asked about 1c more on both grades.

ST. PAUL.

WHEAT—This market showed firmness yesterday under such influences as export buying, a more liberal output at the primaries and reported damage by frost. There were some buying orders in hand at the prices of the previous day, but sellers would not meet them. It was noted that millers were purchasing with some show of confidence, having orders for trade supplies of flour at prices which will permit them to grind as the wheat market now stands. Receipts were fifteen cars, and shipments twenty cars. The lake markets were stagnant most of the day, and prices ruled lower. Speculators did not appear to find as much encouragement in cable advices as on Wednesday, although it is admitted that a considerable export movement has begun.

Local quotations show that the bidding for May delivery of No. 1 hard was 1c higher. Spot, October, November and year were $1 bid; 95c for No. 2 hard; 93c for No. 1; 88c for No. 2.

FLOUR—Trade in this product is moving along at a steady pace. There are no features to record. It shares the uncertainties of the wheat market, but millers think there is a tendency to get above the depression. The range of the market is as follows: Patents, Orange Blossom, $6.75; Red Cross, straights, $6; Capitol, family, $5.50; Bakers, XXXX, $4.50; in barrels, 25c extra; outside brands, 25@50c per bbl less, according to quality; low grades, $2@2.50. Rye flour, $3.75 per bbl. Graham, $4.50 per bbl.

CORN—No. 2 was 48c asked for spot, October and November; 47c year; 47c bid and 49c asked year; rejected, 44c.

OATS—The only transaction recorded was a sale of 1 car condemned at 27c. The bids for No. 2 mixed were 27c spot and October; 28c asked for October, November and year; 31½c bid and 32c asked for May; 26c bid for No. 3 mixed; 28c bid for No. 2 white; 27c bid for No. 3.

Oysters a Cure for Coughs.

From the Boston Globe.

"I'll cure any cough you ever heard of, with one of the simplest remedies you ever saw," said a lady vocalist of considerable reputation on both sides of the Atlantic. "It's oysters. Just plain, simple, every-day raw oysters. I've sung fourteen years here and in the old country, and you may imagine that the climate has often got the better of my lungs, but I rely upon oysters and they can be depended on. My husband told me of this kind of medicine, and I don't know how many years he had used them. They act just as beneficially on my children—and the next time you have a cough go to the oyster bar instead of the drug store."

It seems rather queer, but it is nevertheless a fact, that European cabbages are being imported into this country in large quantities of late—steamers arriving for some weeks past from Germany and Denmark have been bringing these vegetables. One vessel, carried 40,000 cabbage heads, arrived at New York last week. It is said another vessel will shortly bring a still larger supply.

IMPORTANT HOMESTEAD DECISION

Secretary Teller Decides a Case of Great Interest to the Northwest—A Railroad Company and a Settler Involved—Decision Against the Settler.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Oct. 22.—The secretary of the interior to-day rendered a very important decision in the case of the Southern Minnesota Railway Extension company against Augustus Kaufnar, on appeal by the company from a decision of the commission of the general land office. The case directly involved the title to the northwest quarter of Sec. 17, township 104, range 24, Worthington, Minn., but indirectly involved the title to a million acres or more in that State and many millions more elsewhere contained in various railroad land grants. The commissioner permitted Kaufnar to make a homestead entry of his tract. The secretary reversed the commissioner's ruling. Every Minnesota railroad and other land grant railroad companies are intensely interested in the principles involved in the secretary's decision. The decision recites:

The land described is within the ten-mile or primary limit of the grant of July 4, 1866 (14 Stat. 87), making an additional grant of lands to the said State to aid in the construction of railroads therein. The grant was accepted by the State Feb. 25, 1867, at which time it became effective. May 24, 1864, J. A. Hovey made homestead entry 1776 of the tract in question, which remained intact until May 27, 1872, when it was canceled. Kaufnar settled upon the land in October, 1867, and since then has lived upon and cultivated the same. His improvements thereon are valued at $700. In June, 1872, he applied to enter the land as a homestead and paid $18 for fees and commissions. The local officers informed him that they would send him a receipt as soon as Hovey's entry was canceled. Some months after paying such fees, not receiving the receipt, he wrote to your office, and in reply was informed that the land had been awarded to the said company. On March 6, 1876, the tract was certified to the State of Minnesota for the benefit of the railroad above named. You hold that the certification was erroneous, because Hovey's entry excepted the land from the operation of the grant, and that, since the land must be conveyed by patent, it is still under the control of the land department, and direct that Kaufner be allowed to make complete, final homestead proof. The case thus presents for my consideration

TWO IMPORTANT QUESTIONS:

First—Was a patent necessary for the purpose of vesting title, or did the title, by virtue of the grant and the act of certification, pass to the State for the use of the said company?

Second—The lands having been awarded to the company and certified to the State in 1876, should your office, when the facts disclosed by the record, now proceed to make another adjudication and disposition of the land?

The language of the grant before cited is that of a present grant: "That there be, and is hereby granted to the State of Minnesota." The general rule undoubtedly is that title to the public lands of the United States shall pass by patent. Probably the most marked exception to that rule is that of a congressional grant in presenti. In Wilcox vs. Jackson (13 Pet. 516) the court says: "We think it unnecessary to go into a detailed examination of the various acts of congress, for the purpose of showing what we consider to be true in regard to the public lands, but, with the exception of a few cases, nothing but a patent passes as a perfect and consummate title. One class of cases to be excepted is where an act of congress grants land, as is sometimes done in the words of the present grant." When the language imports a present grant it is well settled that the title passes by the act and attaches to the grant, and such title becomes complete and perfect when precision and identity are given to the particular tract by selection or location of the land. Although the grant is a present one, it is undoubtedly competent for congress to put a limitation upon the title, and direct at what time and in what manner it should vest. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine the acts relating to the grant in question, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there are any provisions restraining the operation of the words of present grant. Sec. 4 of the act of July 4, 1866, provides "That the lands hereby granted shall be disposed of by the said State for the purpose aforesaid only, and in the manner following, namely: When the governor of the said State shall certify to the secretary of the interior that any section of ten consecutive miles of said road is completed in a good, substantial and workmanlike manner, as a first-class railroad, then the secretary of the interior shall issue to the State patents for all the lands in the alternate sections or parts of sections designated by odd numbers, situated within twenty miles of the road so completed and lying coterminous to the said completed section of ten miles, and not exceeding 100 sections for the benefit of the road having completed.

THE TEN CONSECUTIVE MILES.

as aforesaid. When the government of the said State shall certify that one other section of the ten consecutive miles shall have been completed as aforesaid. Then the secretary of the interior shall issue patents to the said State in like manner for a like number; and when certificates of the completion of additional sections of ten consecutive miles of the said road are from time to time made as aforesaid, additional sections of lands shall be patented as aforesaid, until the said roads are completed, when the whole of the lands hereby granted shall be patented to the State for the uses aforesaid and none other; provided that if said roads are not completed within ten years from the acceptance of this grant the said lands hereby granted and not patented shall revert to the United States." I do not mean to be understood as expressing the opinion that the title would not in any instance pass by a congressional grant in præsenti, although the act might provide for the issuing of patents. Such a provision, which would have the effect to place in the hands of the grantee evidence by patent of title, would not necessarily be inconsistent with the intention of congress to pass the title by the act itself. On the 13th day of July, 1866 congress passed a further "Act relating to lands granted to the State of Minnesota to aid in constructing railroads" (14 Stat. 97). Sec. 3 of that act provides "That all lands heretofore granted to the Territory and State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of railroads shall be certified to the said State by the secretary of the interior, from time to time, whenever any of the said road shall be definitely located, and shall be disposed of by the said State in the manner and upon the condition provided in the particular act granting the same as modified by the provisions of the act." Sec. 5 provides "That so much of any act as conflicts with the provisions of the act is hereby repealed." This act contains no provisions relating to the issuing of patents for the granted lands, but provides that the secretary of interior shall certify to the State the lands granted. The former act contains no provisions for certifying the lands to the State. When it is remembered that the certification of lands by the secretary of the interior to the grantee has long been recognized as a mode of conveyance, and that such certificates have been regarded and treated as a sufficient conveyance and transfer of title, (a fact which was well known to congress), it can hardly be doubted that it was the intention of that body to substitute that mode of transfer in place of conveyance by patent as provided in the act of July 4.

CERTIFYING AND PATENTING.

The secretary then dwells at considerable length upon the difference between certifying and patenting, and continues:

The act of Aug. 3, 1854 (10 Stat. 346, Sec. 2,449, R. S.), provided "that in all cases where lands have been, or shall hereafter be, granted by any law of congress to any one of the States or Territories, and where the said law does not convey the fee simple title of such lands which have been, or may hereafter be, certified by the commissioner of the general land office under the seal of the said office, either as originals or copies of the originals, or records, shall be regarded as conveying the fee simple of all the lands embraced in such lists that are of the character contemplated by such act of congress and intended to be granted thereby." Such was the general law applicable to grants to States of the character of grants under consideration, when July 13, 1866, congress amended the act relating to lands granted to the State of Minnesota in the manner before stated; leaving out of the amendment the provision for patents and providing for only certifying the lands. When we apply to such amendment, as we must, the general law existing at the time applicable thereto, we find that such general law and the amendment are in complete harmony, and taken together they make the title complete by the mode of certifying the lands. Upon the second proposition presented by this case I deem it only necessary to say that, it having been determined and adjudicated by the department as long ago as 1876 that the land in question passed to the State by virtue of the grant, and it having been so certified, the department cannot now proceed to make another adjudication and disposition of the land, even if the naked title did not pass by the act of certification. It is not claimed that there was any mistake or fraud in certifying the said land to the State. Such certification was in accordance with the decision and ruling then prevailing in your office and this department. Cases so adjudicated cannot be reopened and another disposition be made of the lands because a different rule may be found to prevail at a subsequent time. The lands having been certified to the State, such certification was evidence that the State was entitled to patents, if patents were necessary in order to convey the title. In such case it would clearly be the duty of this department to issue the patents, and when issued they would, by selection, take effect as of the date of certification and cut off all intervening claims. The right to a patent once vested is treated by the government, when dealing with the public lands, as equivalent to a patent issued. When, in fact, the patent does issue, it dates back to the inception of the right of the patentee, so far as it may be necessary to cut off intervening claimants. For the reasons stated, I reverse your decision permitting a homestead entry to be made for the land in question, and if the entry has been made under your decision direct it to be canceled. Very Respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

BECKER COUNTY POLITICS.

The Detroit Record of last week admits that it belongs to the old corrupt ring that has tried for years to get control of the county. The Record says "we and all OUR FRIENDS are squelched." The JOURNAL makes its fight on that old corrupt ring and we are pleased to see the Record thus come out and show its hand by declaring that we are after the Record's FRIENDS. That the old Ring is making a desperate attempt to get control of the County Government is apparent in every move they make—in every utterance of the Record. The Record cannot give one good reason why the ticket nominated at the regular Republican Convention should not be elected, in fact the Record speaks very highly of the candidates and yet the Record says the straight ticket should not be elected. Why not? If they are all good men and true, why should they not be elected to the offices for which the Republican party has nominated them? There is one reason why they should not be (and the Record is silent on that point which is the only reason the Record can have for not wanting the straight ticket elected.) There is not a man on the straight ticket whom the Ring can control. This is the only reason why the Ring says the straight ticket can not be elected and why they will fight to the bitter end to defeat it. If any one doubts that there is a scheme on foot to defeat the will of the people he has only to reflect a moment upon the situation to be convinced of it. The Ring, through their organ, admits that every man on the ticket is true blue, worthy and well qualified for the office for which he is nominated and yet they say that Mr. Hunt, for Auditor, Mr. Torgerson, for Treasurer, Mr. Norcross, for Sheriff and Mr. Larson, for County Attorney must not be elected! They do not even claim to offer better men and the reason must be plain that the only objection they have lies in the fact that they can not control these men. In order to accomplish their schemes they must have pliant tools in office. In place of Mr. A. S. Hunt they offer Mr. A. H. Wilcox the present incumbent of the office of Auditor. Mr. Wilcox has stated that he intends in the near future to remove to Montana, then, if they have the right kind of a county board, they can appoint a tool to their liking. Supposing the Ring deny that Mr. Wilcox intends to remove to Montana or say that he has changed his mind, can they undo Mr. Wilcox's record of last fall in the Kindred campaign? Can they deny and prove to the satisfaction of voters that Mr. Wilcox pledged himself to Mr. Nelson's cause and then turned square about and worked for Kindred? Is such a man better for the position than Mr. Hunt of whom no such thing can be said? And who does the Ring earnestly desire the voters to elect to handle the funds of the county instead of the Hon. T. K. Torgerson? Why, what better man for their object could they desire to find than Ole A. Boe, whose record in Becker County is too fragrant to need repeating to the old inhabitants. The Ring gravely says that Mr. Boe, a man who was once indicted for selling whisky to Indians, who has been a chronic office-seeker and bolter ever since he struck the county, a man who was once arrested on a charge of making a false bill against the town of Hamden while acting as its town clerk, and a man whose whole history in that county will not bear very strict investigation is the man best fitted for Treasurer of Becker County. To be convinced of what kind of a man Boe is one has only to search the records of the county. If the Ring are honestly seeking the best interests of the county why do they choose such a man to run against the Hon. T. K. Torgerson? The cloven foot is too apparent in all this! The covering is entirely too thin! This is more than apparent in the vote in the convention Mr. Torgerson receiving 32 votes and Ole A. Boe only 13. And again, in the case of Sheriff, the old Ring well know that if Mr. Norcross wins the day it is all day with their hopes in that direction. Mr. Norcross is altogether too independent to be a tool for any man or set of men and he don't bull-dose or scare worth a cent. If elected, and it can not be that the voters of Becker County will consent to see him defeated, he will make the best Sheriff that Becker County ever had, straight-forward, honest and efficient. Mr. Norcross is a true-blue Republican and works in a straight-forward manner and what he says he means and that will he do without fear or favor. He don't go sneaking about begging for an election from charitable motives but he came into the convention openly and above-board and sought and gained recognition from the party and he now offers good, honest, faithful, efficient services for the people's consideration. He is a young man, full of strength and ambition to rise and he will rise in spite of the determined efforts of the Ring to kill him off. They hate him because his nature is antagonistic to their pet schemes. They know that they can never control him and hence their determined efforts to kill him. Mr. Offord we do not know anything about but we do know Mr. Larsen, the regular nominee for County Attorney and we know him to be well worthy of the trust imposed upon him. We know he can not be controlled by the Ring and they know it. If these plain statements of facts are not sufficient to convince the voters of Becker County of the existence of a deeply laid scheme by the old Ring there are many others that can and will be brought forward and one has only to consult the records of Becker County to be convinced that there is a scheme [illegible]

The Bierman crowd hope by raising the National issue to pull through because it is an "off year" and they think that but little interest will be felt in the Republican camp. Polk County has at least 5000 good honest Republican votes and should cast every one of them. Get out and vote and see that your neighbor does the same.

The basis of representation for next year will be made on the vote for Governor this fall, hence, in view of the important elections of the fall of '84, presidential and congressional, there should be a full vote. Every Republican in Polk County should constitute himself a committee of one to see to it that not a vote is lost. We have 5,000 Republican votes in Polk County if every Republican votes.

Brother Lankaster, of the Fisher Bulletin quotes a little bit of law in his last issue to show that there is no vacancy in the office of the clerk of the court this fall. We do not believe that Bro. L. does this with a view purposely to mislead voters but simply under a misapprehension of the facts in the case but his statements are however liable to mislead voters all the same, for, if the very law he quotes is correct there is a vacancy which must be filled either by an election or an appointment. There is a good candidate in nomination for the office, put up by the Republican party, Mr. Edward Columbus, and he should receive the hearty support of not only Dr. Lankaster but every other true Republican. If the doctor will take the pains to fully post up on this question he will at once discover his mistake and then be prepared to earnestly support his party and Mr. Columbus or else take a square bolt. "'Alf and 'alf" is not a safe mixture on this deal.

Dont fail to vote.

Rally to the polls. Do not think that because it is an "off year" that it not essentially necessary to vote at this election. Because it is an "off year" is perhaps the very reason why every Republican should cast his vote for it is at such times that the Democrats depend upon to make their gains. Every Democrat will be out in force with his war-paint on and he should meet the solid ranks of Republicanism, no less determined for victory. Dont fail to vote.

FROZEN WHEAT.

Just now the Millers Association is making a terrible howl about frozen wheat, and taking advantage of the fact that there is a small quantity of late wheat injured somewhat by frost, to lower the grade all around and get in another big steal on the hard-working farmer. The smut racket was not far-reaching enough to suit these human vultures who are fattening upon the very life-blood of the country, but now they must raise the universal cry of "frozen wheat," and steal another grade. The simple fact is that the No. 1 Hard wheat, raised in this Valley, is actually worth about 25 cents more per bushel for grinding than ordinary wheat, and when it will bring no more the millers really make that amount out of the farmers. This, in all conscience, ought to satisfy the rapacity of even the millers, but it don't seem to. They must steal in grade and price, and raise all kinds of cock-and-bull stories to further get their hands into the farmers' purse, and even then they are not satisfied. The simple fact is that there must be some remedy found for this or else wheat raising will become so unprofitable that nobody can afford to raise wheat. One remedy would be the establishment of flouring mills upon the many water-powers along our river and the manufacture of flour at home. We can make just as good flour right here as the Minneapolis millers can and retain the bran and shorts for use in the country. When that time comes farmers can expect to get a fair share of the profits for their labors. As it now is they toil and sweat the whole year through and the great soulless corporation, the Minneapolis Millers Association, gets the whole of the profits and, in many cases, more too. We know of one man in Polk County who shipped several thousand bushels of wheat to Buffalo, and after paying all of his expenses he has not received less than 90 cents per bushel net. In his shipment was one carload of the so-called "frozen wheat" which in Polk County the buyers would not offer more than 30 cents per bushel for. (and said that they did not really want to take it at that, but would, simply to accommodate) this carload was shipped by itself and consigned as a sample of the so-called frozen wheat, and it was graded, upon arrival, No. 1 hard but docked two pounds per bushel for the small grains it contained. These small kernels were second-growth wheat that had sprung up since the drought and had not had time to ripen, and were all shrunk up. These could easily be taken out by a fanning-mill, and the good wheat is just as good as before. Right here is the true secret of a great deal of the frozen grain we hear so much about, but it furnishes an excuse for the millers that they are not slow to avail themselves of, and it teaches us that we must have more mills in this country where the wheat is raised if we ever expect relief.

Mazeppa Tribune: After a careful perusal of the several amendments to be voted on this fall in this State, we have arrived at the conclusion that the person or persons who drafted said articles of amendment did not know what they were doing. We therefore advise all of our readers to vote "No" on all the proposed amendments. Their construction is so incoherent and bewildering to the average voter [illegible]

Voice Of The State Press.

St. Cloud Journal: What politics there is grades No. 1 Hubbard, sixty-four pound to the bushel. A little Bierman chaff and cockle got mixed in, but has been pretty thoroughly cleaned out.

Carver Trbune: The Democrts are using Bierman as a bait to catch Scandinavian votes in the hopes of getting into power. Don't you see the hook? It is easy to guess what will be done when the fish is caught.

Ashby Advocate: It is to be deprecated that the head of the Democratic ticket has resorted to the appeal, as a last measure, to men of his own nationality for support. While Mr. Bierman has a perfect right to gain votes by all honorable means, yet his campaign becomes questionable when he tells the Scandinavians they should support him for governor because he is of that nationality. Happily the intelligent Scandinaviors are not to be influenced by his milk-and-water appeal, and on the day of election will cast their ballots on the Republican side and for Hubbard.

Glenwood Messenger: The Democratic papers of the State show their entire ignorance of the situation by affirming that Bierman will carry the Scandinavian votes on the national question—the same as they supported Knute Nelson last year. If that is their logic, they will hit far from the mark. But there are none so blind as those who will not see. The Scandinavians naturally consider this move as a direct insult to themselves and their relation to the Republican party. It requires more than one of their countrymen for a figure-head to make them change those principles which they have loved for centuries. It requires more to change their convictions expressed from time to time since they have removed to this, their adopted country.

Glencoe Enterprise: The administration of Gov. Hubbard has been so conservative and satisfactory to all parties that there should be no falling off in his vote in McLeod county.

Wabasha Herald: The intention of the different amendments was to secure biennial elections, but by excepting judicial offices we think they fail to accomplish the object, and we therefore advise our readers to vote "no" on all the amendments.

Spring Valley Mercury: The Democrats of the State are calculating to gobble up the whole Scandinavian vote, but they reckon without their host. Every true Republican of that nationality will vote for L. F. Hubbard for governor. The "still hunt" is not panning out as rich as expected.

Lanesboro Journal: Bierman's friends do not claim that he is an abler man than L. F. Hubbard, or better qualified for the governorship, but allege that Scandinavians should support him simply because he is a Norwegian. This is a clannish and unwise policy. Norwegian Republicans who do this in fact refuse to support Gov. Hubbard because he is an American! We call upon our Scandinavian friends to pause and take a sensible view of the situation.

The Norden (Norwegian): Gov. Hubbard will be elected with a rousing majority, notwithstanding that his opponent is a Scandinavian. There can be no reason in voting for his opponent just because this opponent happens to be a Norweigian. Bierman has had no chance to prove himself capable to fill such a prominent position as that of governor of Minnesota. Gov. Hubbard's qualifications are known, and he is a Republican. Bierman's qualifications are not known, and he is a Democrat.

Windom Reporter: The Reporter hears of no dissatisfaction with the State ticket from any quarter of the country. Bierman cuts no figure thus far, and we doubt if he will. The Norwegians of the county are Republicans, and in the past have paid very little attention to the nationality question, and we don't believe they will vote for Bierman in face of Gov. Hubbard's excellent record, simply because of his nationality, which seems to be the only ground upon which the Democrats are pressing his election.

Zumbrota Independent: L. F. Hubbard, the present governor, has had a successful and popular administration and will be re-elected by a nice majority. The only feature yet raised in favor of his opponent is that he is a Scandinavian, and with this great and noble attainment claimed for him, his party are trying to "wool it" over the eyes of the Scandinavians throughout the State. Do they think the Norwegians are such fools as this? Our best class of Norwegians are the best and most staunch Republicans in the party. They will vote, as usual, their own ticket, without doubt.

Sauk Center Herald: The Democratic candidate, so by virtue of the declension of a better man, is begging for a complimentary vote from his fellow countrymen on the plea that his case is hopeless any way, and a few votes more or less will not effect the issue, but it will be gratifying to him to receive their support. But the plea will not avail. That he is not in sympathy with the great body of his countrymen is sufficiently evident by the fact that he is a Democrat. No one questions his right to be one, but being so he has no reason to expect Republican support.

Fairmont Sentinel: Bierman is carrying on a back-door still-hunt campaign that is beneath the dignity of any man who aspires to the position of chief executive. He goes among the Scandinavians begging their votes on the ground of nationality. That seems to comprise the stock in trade of his campaign. We cannot believe that the Scandinavians will be swerved from their political principles by such a despicable plea. While there is no danger of Gov. Hubbard's defeat, it is to be hoped the Scandinavians will not attempt to draw the line between race. Such a course would be disastrous to their own political futurd, and would establish a precedent which might prove deterimental to their interests in many ways.

Fergus Falls Journal: If any considerable number of Scandinavians could be induced to vote for Bierman, on the ground of nationality, then Mr. Kindred and his friends would feel approved in much of their campaign talk of last year about Norwegian prejudice, and would arouse at once throughout the district a strong nationality feeling that should almost certainly injure Mr. Nelson and serve to prejudice his candidacy another year. As a consequence of this feeling there is a peculiar apathy among the warm adherents of Mr. Kindred, though it does not suit their purpose to be openly unfriendly to the Republican ticket. Every Scandinavian who supported Kindred may be relied upon to be now giving open or secret aid to Bierman, and we doubt not that the ground of this is, that in so doing he is aiding Kindred and striking a [illegible] last year supported Kindred are magnifying the Bierman movement among Scandinavians, and thus encouraging it. Those papers who stand nearest to Kindred, the Brainerd organ for example, have not hesitated to falsify Mr. Nelson's position, and have even went so far as to represent that he was going to leave the State on purpose to give secret aid to Bierman.

PEOPLES' CONVENTION

At East Grand Forks, at which they nominate a candidate for County Commissioner for the 5th District.

The Convention was called to order by C. Madson. On motion John Ryan was chosen chairman and Andrew J. Hilden, secretary. The chairman stated that as the 5th District was very large and comprised the heaviest tax-paying portion of the county, it was very important that a thoroughly practical citizen should be selected to represent the district on the County Board, and he hoped that the convention would select the right man for the place. Timothy Sullivan, Esq., was placed in nomination and, on motion, the nomination was made unanimous. On motion the convention adjourned.

ANDREW J. HILDEN, Secretary.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

Our correspondent at Neby informs us that the farmers of that place are through threshing, and are all busy plowing.

Antoine Lindon looked in and said he felt happy, as he had threshed out 2,500 bushels of wheat, or, at the rate of twenty bushels to the acre.

August Long, the manager of the Fisher brick yards, informs us that he has just finished brick-making for this year, and that he has manufactured 800,000 this season, all of good quality.

Jim. Bain looked in on Wednesday, and told us his wheat went on an average twenty-two and one-half bushels to the acre, some of it going as high as twenty-six bushels. Good farming will pay.

Some one, or ones, broke into the house of Ole Gunstensen one night this week. They smashed a window and pillaged the building. Ole is anxious to find out who they were, as he has a revolver which he wishes to empty.

A good deal of building has been done this season in and about Neby. Among some of the improvements may be noted an elegant church. A barn, by Mr. Hausberg; a dwelling, by P. Thompson; a barn, by Mr. Bangen, who also contemplates the erection of a house; a large barn, all of hardwood except shingles and siding, by O. Estenson; a barn, by P. O. Estenson; a barn and addition to residence, by O. O. Estenson; a residence, and improvements, P. Q. Latermo; new buildings and improvements, by E. Stortroen, J. E. Hanson, and many others.

St. Vincent Herald: Quite a commotion was kicked up in Hallock this week over the absconding of a couple of fellows, Wilson and Eldridge by name. The facts, as we learn them are as follows: The fellows last spring rented the Holcomb farm, which they cropped. They appeared to be straight-forward and industrious, and so far gained the confidence of the community that they succeeded in obtaining credit to a considerable amount until they should realize from the proceeds of the harvest. Among other things they gave a mortgage on the growing crop. This fall they rushed through their harvest, hired their threshing done at an early day, all the cost of which they were to pay as soon as the grain was sold. With all dispatch possible their grain was hauled to Hallock and sold. After the last bushel was marketed the fellows donned their best clothes and with the proceeds of the sale in their pockets quietly took the first train for St. Vincent. The amount they had realized, as near as we can ascertain was in the neighborhood of $1,200, $900 of which was a draft on the Sterritt Elevator Company. The Hallock creditors must have tumbled to their game at once, for when they presented the draft for payment at the bank here next morning it was refused, Mr. Smith having been notified not to honor it. From here they went to Winnipeg, and from there back to St. Paul, and yesterday we learned that they were arrested there upon a telegram from Hallock. The charge upon which they were arrested is that of selling mortgaged property.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, OCT. 25.

County News.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Mrs. Geo. Crocker, whose illness we mentioned last week, is recovering slowly, and is now regarded as out of danger.

Darling & Sorsoliel are putting in their new engine, and in a few days they will start up the saw mill. This will afford the farmers an opportunity to get logs sawed this fall, to fix up their buildings before winter sets in.

Mr. J. Papin, of the firm of Papin & La Page, Crookston, in company with his wife and child, spent Sunday with us. He contemplates putting in a branch house in St. Hilaire shortly. Mr. Papin and his partner, Mr. La Page are quite large property owners in St. Hilaire, and have an interest in developing the town. They are enterprising men, and will be an acquisition to be proud of.

The first car-load of wheat shipped out of St. Hilaire, was started on its way to Minneapolis on Wednesday morning. Minneapolis Millers, please take notice that this is only the drop before the shower. The farmers in this section have not threshed to any extent, and when they do, you will be astonished at the amount of No. 1 hard that we can furnish you.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Buse & Colbentson have purchased an improved cockle mill for their flouring mill.

The Buse & Colbentson dam on the Clearwater has been materially improved, causing a large increase of water in the pond and flume. The river has also risen considerably within a week.

Tom Daragan and Ole Olson, are the boss threshers of this vicinity, they have been running steady for six weeks and think they will have six or eight weeks more, they are good threshers and give good satisfaction.

A. St. John threshed a field of fife wheat that yielded 28 bushels per acre machine measure and will over run by weight. His son Pete had five acres that made 26 bushels per acre.

We had the pleasure of welcoming last Monday the Rev. W. C. Beebe, of the Presbyterian church, who has just assumed charge of the congregation worshiping in Kretzschmar's hall. During a pleasant visit to our sanctum, Mr. Beebe expressed great admiration of our young town, and, his intention to locate permanently. For the coming winter, his home will be at Mrs. Low's. Mr. Beebe will doubtless prove an acquisition not only to the church but social circles here.

From the Gazette.

"Dunc." Terry, the lively livery man of Crookston put up at the Hotel De LaPerl a couple of days this week.

Last Thursday night, a couple of unknown men tried to enter Mr. Joe. Langevin's residence, probably with the intention of robbery. Joe. was too much for them, however, and they are not likely to try his house again.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

Lizzie Jane Hollinger, a daughter of Chas. Hollinger, aged 10 years, is very low with abdominal typhoid fever of the bowels.

Owing to the past few days being rainy quite a number of threshing crews are stopping in town. The crews do not appear to be lonesome.

The saloon building adjoining C. Madson's store will be sold at Sheriff's sale on the 23d, inst. to satisfy two claims against it for $125. This is the much chattel-mortgaged building.

On last Sunday afternoon Dennis Dwyer, E. F. Masterson, Arne Higdem J. W. Howes, Joe Aaceneau and Chief of Police Hennessey of Grand Forks, were called to St. Paul to appear against the Post Office burglars. This was the second trip to St. Paul for the witnesses. They returned home yesterday, with the exception of Mr. Howes, who went on a visit to Wisconsin. The burglars got four years.

Prosperous Polk County.

Grand Forks Plaindealer.

Among the Crookston people attending the races was Mr. M. R. Brown, who is and old resident of Crookston, is a banker of that city, chairman of the board of county commissioners, and owning quite a number of farms in Polk county. Knowing that Mr. Brown was well posted regarding the condition of Polk county crops, and what the farmers of that live section were doing to better their condition, a reporter of the Plaindealer called on him at the Griggs House, and inquired how everything was at Crooksten and in Polk county.

"Well, we are all feeling good over there. Threshing is all done, and we have harvested a uniform crop of No. 1 hard, averaging 20 bushels to the acre. This is scarcely without an exception. Our plowing is well advanced and farmers will soon be ready for another season."

"You seem to be a little farther ahead than the farmers on this side of the river," suggested the reporter.

"Yes, and it's right here, nearly every township in Polk county is drained on section lines, and last spring when you began seeding we were about finishing, that is on the lands that have been so ditched. The secret of our success is that we have seen the advantages of draining our lands and we can seed earlier, we have better crops, more to the acre and in the fall we get our harvesting, threshing and plowing done for next spring."

"Most of your towns have graders, then?"

"Yes, nearly every town has a grader, some two. One town was very reluctant about purchasing a machine, but they finally did and it did not run a week before they went right off and got another. We all use the New Era Grader and Ditcher, and in fact it is the only machine that would do the work. There is no other way of getting it done, except by scrapers and that would practically amount to nothing. The New Era has been a god send to the people of Polk county. Every farmer that has a ditch on two sides of his farm has it as well drained as the rolling land in the western part of your county."

"Do you find it very expensive?"

"The expense is nothing compared with the cost of ditching formerly. The cost of the machine is the expenditure, and that is so slight when compared with the great benefits derived from the work it does. Why, go to any Polk county farmer and ask him what he thinks of the New Era Grader, and he will tell you it is the best thing he ever saw for the Red River Valley.

"Our farmers are prosperous, contented and happy, collections are easy, foreclosures are scarce; when a note comes due the farmer comes to the front and pays it. Wheat is good, and they have all harvested a good crop, it is all No. 1 hard, and they are selling it as fast as they bring it in. That is the reason they are feeling good. That is the reason the farmers are prosperous and when they prosper every other business must. Now, this is all the result of purchasing a New Era Grader and ditching their lands so they can get on them earlier in the spring, get in their seed and harvest the grain early, and raise and market a crop of No. 1 hard which averages 20 bushels to the acre. I tell you there is nothing else to give credit for the better times in Polk county. The New Era Grader has brought about a new era among the farmers of Polk county."

"You have your farms ditched, I suppose?"

"Some of them, and where the land is ditched the crops are good. Now, I have one farm well drained and this year I raised 31½ bushels per acre. On another where the land is just as good I raised 18 bushels per acre. Nothing but the ditching did that. On the one that was ditched I got the seed in before the other was ready, and got it harvested and threshed before the other was ready. I am thoroughly convinced of the splendid qualities of this machine and of the vast benefit it is to the farmers of our county."

WHEAT RAISING.

The soil of the famous Red River Valley is of wonderous strength and fertility and is peculiarly adapted to the production of the world renowned No. 1 Hard Scotch Fife, and if properly cultivated, will produce an average of from 20 to 25 bushels of that justly celebrated wheat per acre. This, if the farmer could sell for the price per bushel that the eastern demand will warrant would give the wheat raiser a just and fair remuneration for his labor, but for many reasons we are sorry to say that such is not the fact and many are raising wheat this year at a great pecuniary loss to themselves. The reasons for this are many and may be briefly stated. In the first place the farmer himself, is in a measure too blame for his light crops when he does not properly cultivate his crops because without proper cultivation and attention the best of soil will fail to produce large crops. But the greatest drawback to the profitable raising of wheat in this valley is found in the fact that the wheat-raiser is entirely at the mercy of a grasping and soulless monopoly, the Miller's Association, of Minneapolis Almost every farmer in the valley came here poor, too poor to buy the necessary teams, farming implements, seed and provisions wherewith to start in independently. To supply these wants machine manufacturers sent their machines here, horse-dealers brought teams, merchants gave credit, lumber-men furnished material for the little shanties and all took security on the farmer's crops payable on Oct. 1st next. This was the Millers' chance. By some means or other they secured absolute control of of the market, and knowing that the poor hard working former MUST have money by Oct. 1st they marked the price down, way down below what the eastern markets will justify thus taking all of the profits away from the producer and and leaving them without enough to pay up all of his debts and have enough left for bread for his family to say nothing about buying necessary lumber to shelter his farming utensils. This has been going on year after year until the case is becoming desperate and relief must come from some source or one-half at least of our farmers will be utterly bankrupt. The Millers first excuse was that farmers were not careful enough to procure good hard Scotch Fife seed, and so the wheat, most of it, went for soft wheat. The farmers made a great effort to procure the hard variety and did procure and raise it and then the Millers became prolific with all kinds of pretexts for reducing the grades and price, "damp wheat" "smut" and new the cry goes out that the wheat is "all frozen!" This last racket is so successful that much wheat has been bought at from 30 to 60 cents per bushel that ought by rights to bring from 75 to 80 cents; but this is the last straw that breaks the camel's back and now the farmers must arise in their might and demand a change or else they must quit raising wheat altogether, for they CAN NOT go on this way and live. What [illegible] tition. It has been claimed, with how much of truth we are not at present prepared to say, that the St. P. M. & M. Railroad Company are hand in glove with the Millers Association in this matter. Be that as it may the railroad interests in this country are sufficiently enough at stake to warrant their looking into the matter which if they will but do they will find it to their interests to provide for an open market for wheat in this country. If the Millers Association had remained content with a reasonable profit the probability is that farmers would have remained content for years but when they attempt to steal all of the profits of a farmer's labor and not content with that—try to steal the very bread out of the mouths of his wife and children it is time for the farmer to arise in his just wrath and demand a change. An open market, in which every buyer stood a fair show would give our farmers the advantage of the eastern markets that he does not get now and the result would be magical. In a few years every farmer would be out of debt and would be able to erect comfortable houses and barns upon his little farm of which he stands sorely in need and can never obtain by wheat raising as long as the Millers Association is allowed to rule and ruin the country. Business men in St. Paul, Minneapolis ase interested in this matter for upon the success of farmers depends the ability of the business men in the Red River Valley to meet their bills due in those cities. But we never hear any objections from them. To foster the interests of one set of men in Minneapolis they will consent to see their own interests jeopardized without a murmur. It is a wonder to us, in view of the magnitude of this great evil that the business men of this whole Northwest do not unite in mass meetings and make this thing so odious that it would die from very shame. One of two things must happen soon: RELIEF or BANKRUPTCY! Which shall it be?

Voice of the State Press.

Duluth Tribune: Careful inquiry into the causes that led to a personal onslaught upon Lieut. Gov. Gilman, when very little opposition was manifested toward the other candidates has failed to disclose any just cause, and none other than that of personal desire on the part of malcontents here and there to defeat him.

Monticello Times: Leaving all jokes about Bierman out of the question, which really are not argument, it must be remembered that Gov. Hubbard has performed his duties of chief executive creditably and wisely, and the people of the State recognize it and will endorse his efficiency by a good majority in November.

Duluth Tribune: If any Democrat supposes that Hon. Knute Nelson is not heart and soul in the present campaign, and is not giving to Hubbard, Gilman and the entire Republican ticket the weight of his influence, let that Democrat put himself in the way to communicate with Nelson and he will hear of something to his advantage. Same advice to renegade Republicans.

Rushford Star: Bierman counts on many Scandinavian votes in this country, and tells his Scandinavian friends in various parts of the State that Fillmore and Freeborn counties will go almost solid for him. He will be mistaken. The Scandinavians know that a vote for him is a vote lost, and will cling to the Republican party by casting their votes for that sterling gentleman and able executive, L. F. Hubbard.

Morris Tribune: When Mr. Bierman, who has been nominated on the Democratic ticket merely and solely because he is a Scandinavian, asks those of his nationality to vote for him on that account, he not only insults the flag which hangs over his head, but he commits the vilest sort of treason to his adopted country. We do not want a man branded as "Governor of the Scandinavians," but a citizen, without regard to the spot of ground where he was born, or the language he may speak the most fluently. We would rather see Gov. Hubbard defeated without receiving a vote, than to have him elected as an American born citizen. Such a course would involve us in a revolution from which we could never recover. And yet this is what Mr. Bierman would have the Scandinavian citizens do for him. This step of insulting disgrace should defeat him if there were 50,000 Democratic majority in the State.

Sauk Center Herald: Gilman will poll more votes than Hubbard, and will be elected by a larger majority.

St. Cloud Press: The proposed constitutional amendments by which the change is to be effected are so obscure in their provisions and are so differently interpreted that it will be safer to vote "no" and wait for the next legislature to prepare new amendments which shall secure the desired end without being open to the objections which lie against these.

Sauk Center Herald: Gov. Hubbard has nothing to fear from Scandinavian defection in this vicinity, notwithstanding the fact that they poll an immense vote. Advices from those best qualified to know, are that the number of Republican voters who will vote for Bierman on account of his nationality is too small to be considered. The rural Norwegian vote will be thrown within party lines.

Preston Republican: The Democratic party used to be in power in this State, but it never gave any of the offices of importance to the Scandinavians. Neither would it do so now if it was in power. Mr. Bierman has been nominated simply as a forlorn hope, and a bid for the Scandinavian [illegible] bought so easily, and turn their back upon their old friend, the Republican party, that has honored them as much as any other members of the party?

Blue Earth City Post: We have taken considerable pains to talk with representative men of that (Scandinavian) nationality, and are confident that there is no Bierman boom in Faribault county. The eyes of the Republican party is upon them and they cannot afford to sell their vote for the price offered by the Democracy. The nomination went begging about the State and was refused by many prominent men—the men whom that party wished nominated—and at last was utilized as a bait for Norwegian votes. It isn't going to work.

Fergus Falls Journal: Knute Nelson's speech at Pelican Rapids, is a sledge hammer blow at Biermanism in Otter Tail county. Mr. Nelson's powerful logic and straightforward course is convincing. With one breath he strikes at the knownothing principle of voting either for or against a man because of his nationality, and the vile Democratic taunt that "Norwegians are only voting cattle." This with the fact that Bierman's election would be hailed throughout the country as a boom for Tilden, is enough to satisfy every Republican that this is no time to follow after strange gods.

The following letter from C. B. Rockwood Esq., to the chairman of the Polk County Central Committee explains itself:

KEYSTONE, Oct. 23d, 1883.

P. J. McGuire Chairman Republican County Central Committee.

DEAR SIR:—I hereby announce the withdrawal of my name as candidate for County Commissioner for the Fifth District in favor of Mr. Timothy Sullivan, of the town of Sullivan. I accepted the nomination because I and my friends are of the opinion that the efforts now being made by the several towns, and individual land owners, to drain the vast area of our lands subject to overflow, should be given direction by a general typographical survey of the affected districts by an experienced civil engineer employed by the county, whose report should be accompanied by suggestions as to the lines where drains are most needed, giving the size and probable cost of such drains, and apportioning to each town or land owner an equitable share of such cost. A summary and report of that character would be of great value to towns and citizens engaged in the struggle to reclaim their lands, and put an end to the guess-work being done by affording the only sensible basis for harmonious concerted action. Since my nomination I have learned that Mr. Sullivan is heartily in favor of all I and my friends had hoped for, and is so situated that he can attend to the duties of the office without endangering his private interests. This last consideration is too important to the county to be disregarded, and as Mr. Sullivan is eminently fitted for the office by his undoubted character and ability, and having had long experience in public affairs, the voters of the Fifth District will certainly give him their hearty and unanimous support at the polls.

Very truly yours,
C. B. ROCKWOOD.

LOCAL NEWS.

The President has designated Thursday Nov. 29th as Thanksgiving Day.

The Crookston Roller Mill has been re-painted and boast's of a new sign. It will be a thing of beauty and a joy forever.

The wire rope and fixins' for the Crookston Roller Mills have arrived and will be in place as soon as the race is completed ready for it.

Great efforts are being made to prepare the new Congregational church ediffce for services on Sunday next. It is expected that it will be ready in time.

The Canadian Pacific paymaster and 127 men went south to St. Paul on Saturday night. The men will then be paid off and discharged as work on that line is stopped for the winter.

Mr. G. H. Palmer, one of St. Hilaire's booming real estate men, has moved to Crookston with his family and will hereafter do business in this flourishing young city. He will doubtless do well.

A serious break in the canal occurred Friday night or early Saturday morning by which the water was all let out into the river. Workmen were at once put to work to repair the damage and it is thought that the flouring mill will start up to day.

Superintendent Carruth is siding up his residence and regulating its internal arrangments with a view to comfort and eleganee. Mr. Carruth has labored to bring the schools of Polk County up to their present high grade and if any one deserves a comfortable home he does.

It is said that Lee & Herrick's roller mills make splendid flour. We dont know this by experience however much our mouth has watered to try a sample sack of that extra superfine patent, made out of your own No. 1 Hard wheat grown on the JOURNAL farm.

T. B. Walker's foreman, Mr. N. Mason, was unfortunate last Thursday morning. While handling timber he was thrown down and pinned beneath a heavy stick. Upon examination of the injury Dr. M. Van Dyke found a broken leg which he patched up and Mr. M., is now doing well.

Mr. M. E. Filltault has purchased of J. K. Tufty the two lots corner of Broadway and Fletcher Avenue, known as the J. M. Palmer lots. Consideration $3,000 Mr. Filiatrult has shown himself to be a shrewd dealer in real estate and that he knows a good thing when he sees it is evident in the deals he has made.

Gilbert Bang, the 14 year-old son of Thor Bang fell from a dray at the depot on Friday morning last and was seriously injured by the dray passing over and breaking his left leg. He was conveyed to Dr. M. Van Dyke's office and made as comfortable as possible and then taken to his home on Sletten & Cromb's Addition. He is now doing as well as could be expected.

Mr. M. R. Brown suggests a good idea when he recommends the plan of a mill to grind oatmeal and a starch factory in this city. In the fall oats are cheap —in fact there is scarcely any market for them and oatmeal always has commanded a fancy price here and a great deal of it consumed. Potatoes also are plentiful and cheap with no fall market to speak of and these two institutions if established would create a market that is much needed.

"Esmeralda," (One of the best of modern plays) to be presented in this city Nov. 16th by the Madison Square Theatre company is well known to our theatre-goers. This play it will be remembered originally had a run of 850 nights at the home theatre in New York, and has since been played in every city and town in the United States. The company we are assured, is one of great excellence and contains several well known stars.

Rev. S. Currie, of Euclid, has adopted a method of threshing that strikes us as not only perfectly feasible but also a valuable one. He has a horse-power thresher that requires only three or four horses to handle, with which he can pound out from 500 to 600 bushels of wheat per day. Thus he can thresh out of the shock or at any time he pleases and only requires the force necessary to run an ordinary wheat farm. Why wouldn't that be the boss machine for every farmer to have in the family?

The serenade given on last Thursday night by the Northwestern Band was heartily enjoyed by our citizens.

The genial Charlie Douglass, of the Emerson International passed through the city on Friday night enroute for Ottawa.

Mr. E. C. Davis arrived in the city on Wednesday. We have not had the pleasure of meeting the gentleman as yet.

Mr. A. Allen is called "Old Frost" because he is buying up all of the so-called frosted wheat and he is paying good prices for it too.

Wheat still continues at 81 cents for No. 1 Hard. The recent rise in wheat east don't seem to affect the price of wheat here any.

Mr. A. Allen is burning a kiln of 250,000 brick and he says it is all No. 1 Hard and cannot be frost-bitten as the brick were all stacked before the frost.

Mr. Joseph Leguee recently came from Chicago to visit with his brother Mike, and is so well pleased that he has concluded to stay and grow up with the country.

The occasion of the wooden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Beecher, on Tuesday night was a pleasant affair, was well attended and the presents numerous and elegant.

A ZEALOUS WORKER.

"Ah," said Mrs. Crackthorpe, mournfully, "you'll never marry, Christina Carr! Eccentric girls who cut their hair short and part it on one side never do. Men don't like oddity. And then you have such a way of rushing about the streets, at all times and seasons, and carrying baskets and packages to poor people! One might as well be a common carrier at once. If you expect to form a creditable alliance, you must conform a little to the usages of society."

"Nonsense, Aunt Jermima!" said Christina, laughing. "And suppose I don't marry, what then?"

The three Miss Crackthorpes looked up from three crewel-frames, with the amazement which a company of respectable barn door fowls might be expected to feel when an erratic golden pheasant chanced to alight in their midst and astonish them with its foreign ways.

All their lives they had been trained to regard marriage as the ultima thule of all their hopes and aspirations. They had painted and powdered, and frizzed and dressed, danced and tennised with with a steadfast eye to this one end and aim; and here was a black browed gypsy, with hair cut short on her neck like a boy, a zigzag tear in her cambric flounces, and a basket on her arm, actually presuming to doubt the foundation of their platform.

"I know a lot of jolly old maids," said Christina, coaxing the cat to a game of play over the carpet with the tassel of her parasol. "There might be worse fates than that."

"I don't approve of young women making light of such serious topics," said Mrs. Crackthorpe, drawing down the corners of her mouth a la horse shape. "And where are you going now?"

"To visit poor Tom Thompson," said Christina, indifferently.

"A man!" said Aunt Crackthorpe.

"Well, I've every reason to believe he isn't a woman," acknowledged Christina.

"My dear," resumed Mrs. Crackthorpe "don't you regard this system—of miscellaneous running after the poor as extremely—ahem—pernicious?"

"Some one must visit the poor, aunt," said Christina. "And I have leisure, health, and inclination. And I promised dear old Mr. Montagu, when he went to the Azores for that ugly bronchitis of his, that none of the poor parishioners should suffer until the new minister came to take his place."

"There ought to be a regular corps of visitors," said Mrs. Crackthorpe, "to assume those duties."

"Well, I'm a member of the corps, Aunt Crackthorpe," said Christina. "Self appointed."

"Who is this Thompson creature?" said Mrs. Crackthorpe.

"I don't know," said Christina, indifferently. "He must be respectable for he lodges at Mrs. Session's cottage. But I'm very much afraid it's the same poor fellow who was committed last month for being intoxicated in the streets. The mill-hand at Hupperly's, you know."

"But why on earth do you go there?" said Miss Millicent Crackthorpe.

"Because I found this name on a piece of paper on my desk," said Christina Carr. "If any of the poor desire especially to see me, they have only to leave their names and addresses there, and I am always willing and ready to respond to the call."

"But," cried Marianne, the second Miss Crackthorpe, "a miserable, drinking, mill hand like that! I do think, Cousin Christina, it isn't decent for you to go there!"

"It is always decent to do all the good we can in this world," said Christina, curtly.

"I shall talk to the poor fellow, and shall give him a piece of my mind. They tell me he is docile and well inclined when he is not under the influence of liquor; and who knows what straw may suffice to turn the current of his life?"

"I don't think its a woman's business," said Francetta, the youngest blossom of the Crackthorpe family tree, a blue nosed damsel of seven-and-twenty.

"Isn't it a woman's business to do all the good she can in the world?" said Christiana.

And then, weary of the catechism to which she was subjected every time she came to her aunt's house, she rose and took her leave.

"Won't you be at Mrs. Larkin's æsthetic tea-drinking to-night?" asked Marianne, stiffly.

"No," said Christina. "I've promised to show Mrs. Hedge's little girls the afghan stitch this evening. They can get work in the worsted stores if they only understand that."

"I shall see you at the Modern English Poet's Club at three, shan't I?" questioned Millicent, who was literary.

"Oh, I haven't any time for the Modern English Poets!" said Christina.

But Francetta followed her out into the hall—Francetta, who was not an ill-natured girl in the main.

"You'd better come to the club, Chrissy," whispered she. "The ladies are getting up a reception for the new minister, when he comes. Ma doesn't want you to know, because she thinks perhaps he might take a fancy to Marianne: but la! Marianne has not any chance at all, at her age and with a pimpled complexion. Ministers are like other men, I suppose—they like girls that are young and pretty."

"I dare say he's married man, after all," said Christina, laughing. "And I really hav'nt time to come; but I'm obliged to you all the same, Francetta."

And she went away, half amused, half vexed, at the glimpse she had of her Aunt Crackthorpe's tactics.

Mrs. Sessions was a quiet little widow, who let the upper bed room in her cottage when she could get a respectable boarder. She was at the back door, when Miss Carr's light, elastic foot-step touched the narrow path that wound between gay china-asters and rows of purple and scarlet dahlias.

But Christina saw a figure leaning back in the stuffed chintz rocker in the little sitting-room—the figure of a man; so she tapped at the door, and walked composedly in without further ceremony.

"You are Tom Thompson?" said she.

The man started and rose. He was tall and pale, decently dressed in black clothes, and looked, as Chrissy declared to herself, "quite respectable, and rather handsome into the bargain."

"And I," she added, "am Miss Carr. You called at my house. Here I am. Now, Tom," seating herself opposite to him at the table, and resting her elbows in a defiant fashion on the red and black worsted cloth, as she fixed her bright black eyes upon him severely, "I intend to give you a piece of my mind today. Don't you think you ought to be ashamed of yourself?"

"I—I am not sure that I quite comprehend—" began Mr. Thompson, turning scarlet.

"Oh, yes you do," said Chrissy, with a slight motion of her head, as if she would put all prevarication behind her. "You are a decent looking man, and you've evidently a good education. I've heard all about you, you see, and I think it's a shame that you should be staggering about the streets, abandoning your work, and foolishly squandering your means!"

"Miss Carr, I assure you I—"

But Chrissy held up her finger.

"Tom," she said, "take care. Don't tell me a falsehood. I know you quite as well as you know yourself. You're a bad case. You're a hardened sinner. And if you don't stop short now, goodness knows what will become of you Mr. Montagu has talked of you, and—"

"But I think there is some misapprehension here," said the young man, resolutely breaking into the monolougue. "I haven't the pleasure of Mr. Montagu's acquaintance."

Chrissy looked at her interlocutor.

"Aren't you Tom Thompson?" said she.

"I am Thomas Thompson—yes," he admitted.

"A hand in Hupperly's calico mill?"

"Not at all," he answered. "I am simply a laborer in the great field of the world—the clergyman sent here to fill Mr Montagu's place until his return from the Azore Islands. I left my card at your house this morning, as one of the parish young ladies who had been especially mentioned to me as a diligent worker."

Chrissy turned very pink.

"And I," she said, in a faltering voice, "mistook your name and address for that of Tommy Thompson, the English mill-hand, who is always getting intoxicated and leading his fellow-workmen away. I came hither to give him a good talking to, and—and—oh, what must you think of me, Mr. Thompson!"

And she covered her face with her hands.

"I think, Miss Carr," said the young divine, growing calmer in proportion as Christina lost her presence of mind, "that you deserve great credit for the zeal and energy with which you are striving to do your duty. If I were the wrong Tom Thompson—not that I assume myself positively to be the right one," with a roguish twinkle of his eyes—"I believe your eloquence would have brought me a sense of the error of my ways. Please, please, Miss Carr, do not be vexed because of this simple mistake. I assure you that it has made me feel better acquainted with you than a score of formal calls would have done."

Chrissy laughed out, in spite of herself.

"I don't think," said she, "that this morning call partakes in the least of the element of formality. What a shrew you must have thought me."

And then all awkwardness was gone, and they shook hands on an entirely different platform.

"You pardon me?" said Chrissy.

"Entirely!" assented the young gentleman. "And I promise you solemnly that I won't stagger about the streets, nor abandon my work in the future."

Mr. Thompson walked home with Miss Carr, greatly to the amusement of Miss Crackthorpe, who met the pair on Lily Avenue, and could hardly believe her ears when her niece introduced her to the new minister, of whose arrival in town the lady had not been officially aware.

And the next day Mr. Thompson himself went to see his refractory namesake, the mill-hand, and found him in a deplorable condition of low-spirited poverty. Nor did he leave him until he had induced him to sign the pledge.

"I don't think I could have done better than that myself," said Christina, when Mr. Thompson reported progress to her.

Well, time went on, as time always does go on, whether we like it or not. Old Mr. Montagu died in the fragrant wilderness of the Azore Islands, and Mr. Thompson reigned in his vacant pulpit; and when Mrs. Crackthorpe heard that the parsonage was being papered, painted and refurnished for the coming bride of the young minister, she had to retract her declaration that "Christina Carr would never marry!"

"Oh, of course, if she is pleased and he is, it's all right," said Mrs. Crackthorpe, not without acerbity. "But things are sadly changed since I was a girl!"

And the three Miss Crackthorpes are working three anti-maccasar tidies for their cousin Chrissy's reception in the parsonage.—Yankee Blade.

Buttermilk For Whisky.

The taste of the tippling public in "mixed drinks," and even in downright liquors, undergoes some curious mutations, like fashionable taste in the matter of colors and styles; but heretofore the drinks have all contained alcohol, whatever new name was invented for them. A more welcome change from bad to good (or a more singular one) has seldom come to our knowledge than the preference lately developed for buttermilk as a subsititute for old "fire waters." This applies chiefly to moderate drinkers who patronize bars, not to the drunkards; but the sign seems a hopeful one in the direction of sobriety and abstinence.

A reporter of the Philadelphia Times, in reply to inquiries about the prevailing summer drinks, learned the following facts from a saloon-keeper.

"Several years ago there sprung up a rage for weiss beer, a wishy-washy sort of a drink. About fifty Germans went into the business. You could get a schooner of it—a tall glass, big enough to bathe in—for five cents. That had its day, and then came ginger ale and Apollinaris, and after that brown stout and "hal-and-half." Now there is a strong demand for buttermilk. Yes, it is a queer drink for a bar-room; but it has several recommendations. A man might drink a barrel of it if he could, without getting tipsy. He wouldn't raise the neighborhood shouting and singing. He wouldn't want to fight all the fellows in the night-car, or beat his wife when he got home.

But only a small proportion of the production of the dairies is absorbed by the bar-room trade. On Bridge avenue, above Broad street, is the principal distributing depot, where the product of the gentle Jersey and Alderney herds of a number of renowned dairymen are disposed of. "The demand runs the wholeyear round for buttermilk," said an attendant at the dairy. "In the winter time it is only about one-half what it is now. If it were very hot now, as it was a few weeks ago, we would sell one thousand quarts a day. In this sort fo weather we are vending seven hundred to eight hundred quarts. It depends altogether on the temperature to increase the demand and sale.

"We have many customers to whom it is served by the advice of their physicians, who recommend it in cases of dyspepsia and kidney diseases. We have several doctors who buy and drink it by the glass themselves. One physician has sent over twenty customers here, and all have declared themselves benefitted by the beverage.

"I don't think the Irish are the principal purchasers. We sell a great deal by the quart, probably about half we dispose of. The Germans appear to be better customers than the Irish, who have always been noted buttermilk drinkers. The Germans find that buttermilk is as good as beer, which it is superceding. I never questioned any of those who bought it by the glass, but I have heard it well spoken of as a remedy in dyspepsia, and even dysentary."

This healthier taste on the part of those who crave stimulants is by no means a fickle whim of the season, but has been growing for five years past. The swinging screen-doors of scores of bar-rooms are ornamented with the legend, "Ice-cold buttermilk," and all day long those who quaff the beverage pass in and wet their throats and go decorously out.

FARM AND HOUSE.

Household Miscellany.

A GOOD REMEDY FOR HOARSENESS.—Beat the white of an egg to a stiff froth, add two tablespoonfuls of sugar, the juice of a lemon and a glass of warm water.

POP CORN.—We used to pop corn by putting a spoonful of butter in a clean pan together with a pinch of salt and a handful of corn. Cover and put on the fire. Shake gently, and be careful not to scorch.

TO CLEAN A VERY GREASY KETTLE.—Put ashes in it and a little water. In a few minutes scrape the contents all out with a stick and rinse with water. Before this, soap is but wasted on it.

Every one knows how difficult it is to induce a patient to take cod-liver oil, and how the taste is abhorred by most people. A perfectly simple way to prepare it is to drop the desired dose into a little glass of cold water; the oil will form a globule that is easily swallowed. Take a swallow of cold water; then drink rapidly from the glass, keep the mouth closed tightly for a minute, and when you open it you will be surprised that no unpleasant taste is left in the mouth.

To make a slipper-case cut two pieces of cardboard the size desired, and cover them with momie cloth. Then cut of cardboard a smaller piece for the pocket, cover it on one side with the cloth, and fasten it in the center of one of the larger pieces; then finish where it is joined with a worsted cord. Over hand the two large pieces together, and sew the cord all around the edge. To hang it sew two large brass rings at the back of the two-side scollops.

Cheap unbleached muslin curtains are made to look very picturesque by drawing out the threads a space of two inches on the sides and at the lower edge; hemstich the same with French cotton and trace with embroidery cotton at regular intervals over the rest of the drapery clustered leaves, and give to the outer edge a finish of plaited lace.

Morris, the English poet decorator, deprecates the American love of bizarre effects and the American tendency to crowd their rooms with ornaments. The London agent at the Boston foreign fair says it is characteristic of him to say to persons seeking his advice in regard to furnishing: "Choose something harmonious for floor and hanging, then add a table and cushioned seats around the wall!" "His own house" continued the agent, "is, although very beautiful, quiet in its simplicity." Yet the poet designs all varieties of household furniture, and by no means confines his attention to textile fabrics. This advice indicates, therefore, an intention to repress that overcrowding to which Americans are particularly prone.

Cows Bringing High Prices.

At the sale of Mr. Cooper's imported Jersey cattle cows were in good demand, but the bids for bulls were not active. Two good bulls were withdrawn, as little more than what their beef would fetch was offered. One of the cows, Saragossa, by Cœur de Lion, out of Venus, was put up at $500 and was rapidly run up to $1,500 then to $2,000, $3,000 and was finally knocked down at $4,800. Nonpareil, another cow of good record, sired by Flockwell, and guaranteed to give twenty-four quarts of milk daily, was also eagerly bid for and she brought $2,950. The total amount realized by the sale was $50,996. Withernsea, a 4-year-old, by Cœur de Lion, out of Lemon Peel, brought $2,500. The Lady of Kassacin, a 4-year-old cow, a granddaughter of Khedive, was bought by Col. H. S. Russell for $2,150. Fancy Free, 2 1-2 years old, a daughter of Cetywayo and Jersey was sold to Thomas Allen, of Pittsfield, Mass., for $2,000. Anguerez's Gem, six years old was sold to Col. Russell for $[illegible]0 0. Fifteen hundred dollars was paid for Bliss, 2 years old, a daughter of Pedro and Gold Leaf, by Col. Russell. Caty, a 5-year-old cow, a daughter of Vertumnus and Lily, was sold to Henry Pierce of San Francisco, for $1,200. Auricula, 2 1-2 years old, a daughter of Bubby and Lily, was sold to G. N. Forman, of Olean, N. Y., for $1,150. Guenon's fancy, 2 1-2 years old adaughter of Cetywayo and Guenon's Pride, was sold to Col. Russell for $1,010.—New York Times.

The Farmer's Horse.

The ideal farmer's horse is a horse of good constitution and endurance, of good disposition, a fast walker and a roadster, and that is the all-purpose horse. Such a horse can be had. If a good driver, the animal will most likely be more serviceable in the work on the farm. A wretchedly poor roadster is generally poor everywhere. He is a mope at best. But a horse that is active and strong on the road, will be a good horse, according to the present standard, on the farm, if he is of sufficient size. In the matter of size opinions will differ, and it is not material whether the animal is large or small—if not too small—if it has the aggregation of merits which we have briefly stated. As to endurance it is a quality usually confined in its application to road or trotting horses, but there is no place in this world in which a horse is ever put that he needs more endurance than he does on the farm. It is true that if he lacks that the defect may not be as particularly noticeable while he is at work as it would be in the case of a horse on the race track or on the road. He may do all the work that is expected of him, but farm work is hard work, and if the horse lacks endurance, which is the result of a strong constitution, he is rapidly wearing out, and his period of usefulness ends much sooner than it should. A good disposition, also, is of paramount importance, not only for the good of the horse himself, but for the safety of those about him. A bad dispositioned horse is always the source of danger, and if he does no damage during his life those who handle him are in exceptional luck. The Western Rural.

Jersey Cattle.

The demand for imported Jersey cattle in this country has been so great in the last fifteen years and so many animals brought over to satisfy it that the source of supply is nearly exhausted. We are told that it is now difficult to find choice Jersey cows even in Jersey. The Islanders have nearly ceased to keep the animals for milking purposes; they rear them almost exclusively for foreign markets, chiefly the American, and they cannot raise enough to supply the demand. There are three islands in the channel group lying off the French coast that are the home of these valuable animals—Jersey, Guernsey and Alderney we receive the most desirable cows—the gentle deer-like little creature so highly esteemed for their rich milk and its yield of golden butter. The same species is found in Guernsey, but there it is larger, coarser and does not yield as rich milk.

But it would not be a great misfortune if the breed were to be entirely exhausted in the channel Islands; it has been successfully transplanted in this country, and been improved by the process. There are finer Jersey cows to be found in the United States than on the island of Jersey. Our richer pasturage and the general kind treatment they receive have had the effect of improving their milking qualities, and it is probable that choice animals will in the future be sought after here for English farms.

Crossing Breeds of Poultry.

We once heard a man say he could raise any kind of birds he desired by simply crossing one variety with another. We have tried the experiment for years but have had no results from which we were satisfied with our undertaking. We have crossed Dorkings and Black Spanish for the purpose of getting the characteristics of the Dorking impregnated with those of the Black Spanish. The crossing was anything but satisfactory, as far as giving the flesh of the cross the table qualities of the Dorking. The size proved larger than the Dorking, and the laying qualities were not unlike those of the Spanish, the eggs being large and chalky white in appearance. But the flesh of the fowls lacked that plump and buttery appearance of the Dorking.—W. M. Lewis.

A Home Made Filter.

John Michaels, in a communication to the New York Sun, says:

I trust the home made filter here described may soon be found in every home, for a water supply loaded with a mass of filthy and poisonous contaminations should be rejected without hesitation until cleansed from impurities by good filter.

Purchase a common galvanized iron pail, which cost fifty cents. Take it to a tin shop and have a hole cut in the center of the bottom about the size of five cent piece, and direct them to solder around it a piece of tin about three-fourths of an inch deep, to form a spout to direct the flow of water downward in a uniform direction. Obtain about two quarts of small stones at a store where material for roofing is sold; after a good washing place about two inches of these at bottom of pail to form a drain.

On this place a partition of horse-hair cloth or Canton flannel cut to size of pail. On this place a layer of animal charcoal, sold at the wholesale chemists as boneblack at about ten cents a pound. Select this about the size of gunpowder grains, and not in powder. This layer should be three or four inches. A second partition having been placed, add three inches of sand, as clean and fine as possible. Those within reach of glass makers should purchase the sand there, as it is only with that quality of sand that the best results can be obtained. On this place another partition, and add more fine stones or shingle—say for two or three inches. This serves as a weight to keep the upper partition in place.

Your filter is now complete, but not ready for use. However careful you may have been in washing the material, a residue of dust will remain, and this has to be gradually washed through. For this purpose pass as much water as possible through the filter during the first day without using it. The next day it will be ready for use, and if my directions have been complied with filtered water will be always at command, not only freed from all suspended circumstances, but from color due to matter held in solution having been removed. I found that the yellowish color of Croton water, which is very difficult to remove, was entirely absent in water passed through my filter.

Where the Bridegroom Buys the Trosseau.

According to Mexican custom the prospective bridegroom must not only purchase and furnish a house beforehand, but he must buy all the wedding trosseau—even to minutest accessories of the toilette which may be needed for years to come; and is expected to make gifts to the bride's family, and bridesmaids and all the immediate friends concerned, and to defray all the expenses of the wedding feast and subsequent festivities. It must be remembered that everything costs enormously in Mexico as compared to American prices, furniture and goods of all kinds being imported at great expense in transportation as there are comparatively no manufactories and no railways, and the duties are simply outrageous. Fortunately for the bridegroom's depleted pocketbook there is no going off on wedding tours, the absence of anything but stage and mule transportation making that foolishness an impossibility, but the married pair go directly to their new home on the wedding day, and eat the first connubial breakfast under their own vine and fig tree.—[Correspondence Cleveland Herald.

The Bishop of Northern Dakota.

New York Special—: The Rev. William D. Walker, pastor of Calvary chapel, East Twenty-third street, this city, who was the 24th elected bishop of Northern Dakota by the general conference of the Episcopal church at Philadelphia, was seen to-day by your correspondent. The reverend gentleman is an unmarried gentleman about forty years of age, a little above the medium height, with black hair, side whiskers, piercing black eyes, and very regular features. His appearance was extremely pre-possessing. He was attired in the regular clerical garb, and bore himself with ease and dignity.

"When do you expect to take charge of your new diocese in Dakota?" was asked.

"That I cannot tell you at present. Although elected, I have not yet decided to accept. Still it is not improbable I shall do so. I have been in charge of Calvary chapel for twenty-one years, the one now standing having been erected for me eleven years ago. I must take time to decide upon such an important event as the withdrawal from my congregation, who are so much endeared to me, and who have treated me so kindly for so many years. My congregation is a large one, about 1,000, with 450 communicants, and a Sunday school of 450. All these associations tend to bind me to New York. My people have sent me five times to Europe on my vacations."

"Have you an idea of the field for ministerial labor in Dakota?"

"Nothing more than some of my friends who have been there have told me. They say it is a cold country, and very barren in part, but that it is growing faster than any other of the territories, or, in fact, state in the country. I feel satisfied if this is the case that my field will be an excellent one."

"Where will you probably locate?"

"Of this I have no idea. My election have been very sudden and wholly unexpected, and I have not of course been able to consider the change fully. I cannot go for a considerable time in any event, and as I said, it is not sure that I will accept."

Members of the Rev. Mr. Walker's church to whom your correspondent spoke concerning his removal express great unwillingness that he should leave them. Every influence will be brought to bear to induce him to decline the bishopric.

A Town of Extraordinary Rapid Growth.

Albuquerque (Albukerky), the metropolis of New Mexico, is one of the most phenomenal cities in the United States, so far as rapidity of growth is concerned. In April, 1880, the first train of cars reached the present town site, which was then a body of farming land. The town was laid out the following summer, and the marvelous building boom began which has resulted in a substantial town of fine business blocks and pleasant residences, many of which would be a credit to cities of 100,000 inhabitants. A large proportion of its business houses are of brick. The old Mexican town of Albuquerque is a mile or more distant and at the time of the establishment of the new town contained 3,500 inhabitants. It is estimated that the two taken together now number in the neighborhood of 10,000 people. No town in the west, with the exception of Leadville has ever experienced so rapid a growth.

Gospel Facts.

[The following has appeared in nearly every newspaper throughout the United States, and is one of the finest testimonials ever won by a medicine proprietary or otherwise. Dr. Crane (he is a graduate of medicine as well as a clergyman) gives his evidence without any solicitation whatever. It will repay to read it]

"I have never seen a medicine more perfectly adapted to its various applications than Thomas' Electric Oil. I was for many years a sufferer from quinsy; Thomas' Electric Oil cured me. My wife and child had diphtheria; Thomas Electric Oil cured them; and if taken in season it will cure seven times out of ten. I am confident it is a cure for the most obstinate cold or cough, and if taken into the head, by the nostrils, two or three times a week, will positively relieve the most offensive case of catarrh; and notwithstanding the delicate nature of the mucous membrane of the nasal organs can be taken up with perfect impunity. For deafness and earache it has done wonders to my certain knowledge. It is the only medicine unboed patent that I have ever felt like recommending, and I am anxious to see it in the house for any consideration. It also operates in asthma as a specific, and whenever it is used it becomes indispensable to household safety. I am ready to give any one the benefit of my observation, both as to its effects and mode of application, if they will drop me a note making inquiry." Rev. E F. Crane, Dunkirk, N. Y. Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincin'ti, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Mathias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has cured many others of Bronchitis.

Personal Paragraphs.

Vennor has a southern rival in Professor G. R. Cather, of Alabama, who says that the winter will be very cold and early, and "phenomenal for its paroxysmal spells of heat, succeeded by intense cold over the country."

Mrs. Agnes Booth is to play the leading parts this winter at the Park Theatre in New York. She will also conduct the business from her late husband's estate from which she will receive about $100,000.

Says John L. Sullivan of his saloon: "It cost me $20,000 to fit it up. I put in a stock amounting to $5000. I opened it on August 7, and up to last Monday I had taken in $25,000. That is enough to pay for it. The opening night I took in $2900 and the first Saturday $2400.

Richard Francis, who has been appointed carterer to the Senate, is not the only colored carterer who is worth a large amount of money. The headwaiter at the West End Hotel, Long Branch, has a bank account of over $100,000.

The champion drunkard of the world is a woman named Jane Johnson, of England, now eighty-four years of age. She has been convicted of drunkeness in Leeds and other towns of Yorkshire over two hundred times. Twelve months ago she joined the ranks of the Salvation Army, and caused no small stir by the thrilling stories she told of her remarkable career.

A pretty orphan girl with over $2,000,000 has been advertising in the German papers for a husband. She describes herself as 21 years old, orphan, Catholic, with a fortune of 12,000,000 francs. She wants to marry a man with a very honorable name. She may be addressed as N. O. G. N., at the Post Office, Brussels. No agents need apply.

Mr. John B. French, formerly sergeant-at-arms of the United States senate, in his lecture, "Ten Years Among the Senators," ranks William Pitt Fessenden as the greater member of that body he ever knew, but says that he went in and out of the senate chamber with less pretension than the man who opened and shut the doors.

General Putman (of wolf-killing fame) is buried in the pretty village cemetery half a mile south west of Pomfret, Conn., an inclosure of several acres, with quiet air, green turf, sombre firs and dry sandy soil. In a secluded corner of the yard, among many broken, mossy tombstones, a heavy table of marble lies on a wall of brick that lifts it but five or six inches from the ground. The stone is about six feet long by two and one-half wide, and marks the grave of Putman. Fully a third of it has been chipped off by relic-hunters.

Mr. Shirk of Peru, Indiana, owns seventy-three farms in Indiana that are all in a high state of cultivation. He also owns thousands of acres in Texas, Arkansas, Michigan and Iowa, nine residences, business blocks without number, some of them being situated in Chicago and Indianapolis' three banks, several stores, and as many mills, which he conducts himself. The remainder of the earth is gradually falling into Mr. Shirk's hands, but he is a good man, and will allow the rest of us to rent from him.

"I suppose the time will come," said General Sherman in Cincinnati the other day, "when we decrepit old men will be hauled around in carriages and shown as relics. It's the way of the world." After his retirement in November he will live near St. Louis, in a house that he says has been very handsomely fixed up by Mrs. Sherman. He looks forward to the time with pleasure.

On board the Pacific Mail steamer Australia is a rather venerable Chinaman called John Tuck who is nearly blind, and does only light work. Many years ago one of the company's ships was taking a cargo of gold from California to Hong Kong. A fire broke out, the Chinese sailors were demoralized, and this man controlled them. It was owing to him that the crew did not seize everything for a piratical expedition. The company would not part with John Tuck after that.

When Mr. Carnegie, late of Pittsburg, visited the great Baird iron works at Gartsherrie on the Clyde, his comment was: "A nice little foundry." In indignation it was asked him where he could find a bigger. "Why," said Mr. Carnegie, with imperturable serenity, "I own a bigger one myself." A bet was made; a Gartsherrie representative went back with Carnegie to Pittsburg, and the outcome of the inspection there was that the American had won the bet.

House-keeping Difficulties.

New York Letter to St. Albans, (Vt) Messenger.

Until recently we have been particularly fortunate in servants, having had two girls for the past seven years. But the cook was getting a little too independent and unwilling to be instructed; so we concluded to make a change. But I fear we have "jumped out of the frying-pan into the fire." We went to a bureau for Swedish servants, and secured two who were well recommended. The waitress and chambermaid is all that could be desired—a pleasant, happy face, sweet temper able and willing. But the cook! Well, she is a good cook, and washer and ironer. But what a fright! She would make an excellent scare-crow. Put her in a corn field and not a crow would be seen within a half mile! But her good work makes up for her ill looks, and we are all satisfied. She has been with us only ten days and to-morrow she leaves! My daughter said to her: "I think you make a great mistake; we have but four in family, and your labor is very light. Are you not satisfied with your situation? Have you not been treated well?" "Yes," she snickered; "but I am going to be married next week, I have not seen the man but my sister has. I was engaged once before, but somehow it was broken up." Here we lose a good servant because she expects to be married within a week to a man she has never seen!

A Pungent Prayer.

The following spirited prayer was offered by Elder Littlejohn in 1850. Oh, Lord, there is great wickedness and much drunkenness in our young and rising towns. Therefore, O Lord, we crave thy blessing. Now, Milwaukee, just sprung up, is bad; Chicago, another mushroom is worse. Yet do thou Lord, bless and improve them. Then there is Michigan City, a place of sand and whisky, and Laporte, of mud and wickedness; and, indeed, they need thy blessing. And there is South Bend, and also Niles, which think themselves righteous but are full of rumholes and rottenness. Lord, they need thy blessing. And here is Mishawaka, which boasts itself something, but has nothing but self-righteousness. Good Lord, open its eyes, that it may receive thy blessing. Then we have Elkhart and Bristol and Mottville—little things, but wicked. Do, Lord, bless them. [Then, pausing for breath and raising his voice to its highest pitch:] And lastly, then, dear, good Lord, even bless Constantine, where Gov. Barry sells whisky at three cents a glass! Amen.

GIVING AND RECEIVING.

The fiery crimson of the stormy November sunset was staining all the hills with its lurid glare; the wind, murmuring, restlessly among the dead leaves that lay heaped over the wood paths, seeming to moan with almost human voice. But the autumnal melancholy without only served to brighten the cheerfulness of the roaring wood fire, whose ruddy glow danced and quivered over the rough rafters of Woodbridge's spacious old kitchen sparkling on the polished service of platter, and glimmering and shedding a long stream of radiance through the uncurtained windows, out upon the darkened road.

"Yes, as I said afore," observed the old farmer, rubbing his toil-hardened hands together, and gazing thoughtfully into the fire, "it's been a capital harvest this year. I would ask for no better. So wife, you just pick out some of them yaller pippin apples, and put'em into Jessie's basket when she calls arter it."

"Won't the little red un's do as well? I calculate to keep them pippins for market. Squire Benson says they are worth"—

"I don't keer what they're worth," interrupted the farmer, as his helpmate, a spare, angular woman, with a face ploughed with innumerable lines of care fingered the yellow-cheeked apples dubiously. "I tell you what it is, Keturah, folks never lost anything by doing a kind thing. I never could make you believe that, unless pay came right in hard cash. Now here's Jessie Morton, as likely a young gal as ever breathed, teaching school day in and out and her marm sewin' to hum, earnin' a livin' by the hardest work, born ladies both of 'em. Don't you s'pose these apples 'll be worth more to them if you'd give 'em with a kind word, than they would be to that pesky tight-fisted agent up to Hardwiche Hall, if he gave a dollar a bushel?"

"Charity begins to hum," said Keturah, jerking out her supper-table, with an old twist of the face.

"Not but what Jessie's well enough—but you'd a plaguy sight better be scratchin' your pennies together to pay up that mortgage, if you don't want the Hardwiche agent forclosing on you And them pippins is just as good as so much money. There may be, anyhow, in the basket—one of your investments. I guess."

"One of my investments, then, if you like to call it so, Keturah," said the farmer with a good-humored laugh, banishing the annoying expression which had overspread his face when she alluded to the mortgage. "Come 'long in Jessie, my gal," he added cheerfully, as a light touch sounded on the door-latch. "Here's the basket all right, and some of them golden pippins tucked in to it. May be they'll tempt your mother's appetite."

Jessie Morton was a slender graceful girl, of about seventeen, with satin-smooth bands of chest-nut hair, parted above a low, sunny forehead, large liquid eyes, and cheeks which farmer Woodbridge always declared, "set him to thinking of the velvet Jersey peaches that grew on the tree down on the south medder." She took up the basket with a graceful smile that went to the flinty heart of Mrs. Keturah.

"O, Mr. Woodbridge, how kind you always are to us! If I were only rich—it I could only make some return"—

"Don't you say a word about that are," said the farmer rubbing his nose very hard. "Just you run home fast as you ever can for it is getting most dark and the November wind ain't no ways healthy, as I over heard on. And I say, Jessie, if it rains to-morrow so you can't get to school handy, just you stop here, and I'll give you a lift in my wagin."

"Dear old Mr. Woodbridge," soliloquized Jessie Morton to herself, as her light steps pattered along on the fallen leaves, "how many, many times I have had cause to thank his generous heart. And to think that he should be distressed about the mortgage by the agent at Hardwiche Hall.

She paused a moment to look up to where the hall rose darkly outlined against the crimson sky. On a commanding height, and nearly hidden in trees, many of which still retained their brilliant autumn foliage, it seemed almost like an old baronial castle.

"There it stands," she mused, "shut up and silent, year after year, its magnificent rooms untenanted, the flowers blossoming ungathered in its conservatories. Since Mrs. Hardwich died—twenty years since, mamma says—the family have been away, and now the other surviving heir is traveling, no one knows where. I wonder if he knows how grasping and cruel his agent is? Oh, dear," she added softly, "money does not always come where it is most needed. If I were the mistress of Hardwiche Hall!"

She started with a light scream the next instant, as a tall figure rose up from a mossy border by the roadside, directly in front of her.

"Pardon me," said a voice, that instantly re-assured her, for it was to gentle to come from any but a gentleman, "but I am not certain but I have lost my way. Is this the Eden road? I was waiting for some one to direct me?"

"This is the Eden road," said Jessie, all unconscious that the last gleams of the fading suns t were lightening up her face with almost angelic beauty, as she stood there among the fallen leaves.

"And can you tell me the shortest foot-path to Hardwiche hall? I have not been in this neighborhood since I was a child, and I am completely at fault."

Jessie hesitated a moment. "I could show you better than tell you, for it is rather a complicated road," she said. "and if you will accept my service as guide it will not be much out of my way."

"I shall feel very much honored," said the stranger. "Meanwhile let me carry your basket."

It was a wild and lovely walk, winding among moss garlanded trees and hollows, sweet with aromatic incense of dying leaves. Jessie could not help admiring the chivalric manners and chivalric courtesy of her companion, and he was pleased with the blooming loveliness and girlish dignity of the young guide. A few adroit questions respecting Harwiche hall and its neighborhood sufficed to draw forth a spirited abstract of the Hardwiche agent, and the imposition he was wont to practice upon the tenants and neighbors, as well as an arch description of most of the "characters" thereabouts. Then he continued to learn all about Jessie's little school, and her ailing mother, and he smiled to himself in the twilight to observe the pride of her mien, when she alluded to the high position from which unforseen reverses had compelled her mother to descend.

"There," she said, suddenly pausing with a feeling as if she had been almost too communicative, "if we could only cross yonder lawn, the gates are close by, but we shall have to go a mile around."

"Why?" asked the stranger.

"Mr. Talcott will not allow travelers to cross here—he says it is private property."

"I fancy I shall dare Mr. Talcott's wrath," said the gentleman laughing, as he pushed open the wire gate that defended the forbidden space. "It is perfectly absurd to make people go a quarter of a mile out of their way for a mere whim."

They had scarcely entered the enclosure when they met an unlooked for obstacle—Talcott himself—who was prowling over the grounds on the qui vive for trespassers.

"Hello, there!" growled he; "just turn back if you please. This isn't the public thoroughfare."

The stranger held Jessie's arm under his own a little tighter as if to repress her evident inclination to "beat a retreat." He was disposed to maintain his position.

"I don't see any reasonable cause why we should not go ahead," he said pertinaciously. "There was a path here, and I supposed it was made to walk on."

"Not for you," said the agent contemptuously, "so go back with you as fast as you can!"

"Is it possible that people are made to travel a circuitous and unpleasant route, for no other reason than your caprice, sir?" asked the gentleman, looking down upon the little man, from the attitude of his six feet, with a kind of laughing scorn. "Did it ever occur to you, my friend, that others have rights and conveniences as well as yourself?"

"Can't help their rights—nothing to me," snarled the agent, planting himself obstinately in the path. "I forbid all passing here!"

"But I suppose Edward Hardwiche may have the privilege of crossing his own land," persisted the stranger, still preserving the half contemptuous smile that had from the beginning made the agent so uncomfortable.

Talcott grew not exactly pale, but yellow with consternation.

"Mr. Hardwiche, sir, I did not—we did not expect"—

"No, I know you didn't my good man. Be so kind as to step aside and allow me to pass with the young lady. Miss Jessie, don't forget that I need your services a few moments yet. Nay, do not shrink away from me—are we not to be very good friends?"

"The prettiest girl I ever saw in my life," was his internal comment, as he at length parted from her at the little gate where burning ashes and dark green ivy were trained together with all a woman's taste.

* * * * * *

The Christmas snow lay white and deep on the farm-house eaves—the Christmas logs cracked on the hearth where Mr. Woodbridge still gazed dreamily into the glowing cinders and Mrs. Keturah's knitting needles clicked with electric speed.

"That mortgage bothers me—it bothers me," he murmured, almost plaintively. "Well, I suppose it ain't no use frettin'; but I thought to live and die in the old place my father did before me. The Lord's will be done though. Somehow things ain't prospering with me—I don't seem to get along."

"You ha' got along well enough, I guess," responded Kerturah, who belonged to that class of people known as Job's comforter's, "if you only looked after your p's and q's as I told you. You always was too free handed, and now you see what it's bro't you too."

"Well, well, Keturah, we never did think alike on some things," returned the old man. "Let's talk about a pleasanter subject. What do you think about our school-marm's marrying young Mr Hardwiche to-morrow? Didn't I always tell you that Jessie Morton was born to be a lady? I may be unlucky myself, but anyhow, I'm glad to hear of little Jessie's luck."

"You'd a deal better keep your sympathy for yourself," growled Keturah. "What's other folks luck to you, I'd like to know? There's some one knocking at the door; see who tis!"

It was a little note, brought by one of the school boys under Jessie's care. "Where's my glasses! I can't see as I could once. Shove the candle this way, will you, Keturah?" And fitting his brass bowed spectacles upon his nose, the old man unfolded the note and read, in Jessie's delicate chirography:

"Do not let that mortgage disturb your Christmas Day to-morrow dear Father Woodbridge. It will never haunt your hearthstone again. Mr. Hardwiche will send you the papers soon to destroy I have not forgotten those 'golden pippins,' nor all the other kindnesses."

"Aha, wife!" said the old man smiling and trying to brush away unseen the big tears that would come, "what do you think of my investments now?"

Keturah's reply was neither elegant, nor strictly grammatical, but it was significant. She said simply:

"Well, I never."—Home Circle.

She Knew Him Best.

John William Blank belonged to the Ancient and Modern and Highly Honorable Sons of Guns of Detroit. If it wasn't that it was some other fraternal order which meets every Monday night and pays so much to the heirs of every member who happens to die.

John William happened to die the other month, and a committee was appointed to draft resolutions and present them to his wife in person. The first part of their duties was fulfilled to the entire satisfaction of the lodge, but the committee had some little trouble in finding Mrs. Blank. They traced her from one neighbor to another, and finally found her at her sister's hat and shawl on and ready to go out.

"Resolutions of sympathy, eh? Well, read em."

The chairman of the committee proceeded to read that John William was a good hus and and a kind father and a citizen of unapproachable integrity, when the widow interrupted:

"Too much taffy! We used to have a fight every week, and as for his bein a kind father we never had any children. As for his integrity he stole all the wood we burned last winter."

The chairman gulped down something and continued to read that John William was an upright brother, a man with a heart full of sympathy for the misfortunes of others, and that charity and forgiveness were the beacon fires which guided his footsteps.

"Fudge!" sneered the widow. "I washed for the money to pay his dues to the lodge, and all the sympathy anyone got out of him wouldn't buy a cent's worth of court plaster! Forgiveness! Well, some of you ought to have sat down on his hat some time! He'd have revenge if it cost him a year in State prison. Beacon fires is pretty good considerin' that we never had a decent fire in the house!"

"Madam, your husband has been called hence."

"Exactly, I was at the funeral and ought to know."

"He was cut down like a flower."

"Well, flowers ought to let whiskey and saloons and plug-tobacco and old sledge alone."

"And we trust that our loss is his gain."

"Well, if he's any better off I'm glad on't, but I guess the gain is on your side. Now that's all I want to hear. I can pick up a thousand better men than him with my eyes shut. I'm in a hurry to go down and see a woman who offers a fur-lined circular for $15, and if you have any more highfalutin Shakespear to git off my sister will take it in and save it till I come back!"

Last year's crop of oranges in Florida was reckoned at 50,000 million oranges. This year it is put at 102,000, and at $3 per box is worth $1,800,000.

A DESERT ISLE.

It was 10 o'clock of a July morning, and the largest fraction of humanity had been some hours earning its daily bread. The idlers had just risen from the breakfast table. To this latter class belonged the young man who leaned lazily over the piazza railing, and looked absently out on Lake Winnipaka. Beside him in a huge chair, sat a little woman, rocking to and fro, with an untiring movement, and with deft fingers plying in and out among bright silk and crewels. She was idle, too, in her woman's laborious way but there was a lack of repose in her indolence that made it restful to turn again to her brother, who stood in statuesque inaction, looking into the still water below.

"What are you going to do to-day?" the little woman asked.

"Nothing."

"There's a great deal going on, and very nice sort of people, too. Do you see that pretty girl down there at the landing?"

"The one with red?"

"Yes; don't you think she's pretty?"

"I hadn't thought of it."

"Well, she is—remarkably. Wouldn't you like to meet her? I could easily manage it."

"I'm not particular. Is she worth while?"

"Ben, you exasperate me. Do you take an interest in anything?"

"I don't do anything else in Wall street. I'm off duty now. I believe in resting in a philosophical sort of a way."

"Well, I suppose you are tired, poor fellow! I know how you feel. I am tired myself most of the time."

"Tired! I look like it," laughed the young man. "I'll tell you how it is; I simply want my liberty. It doesn't pay—this dancing attention on half a dozen girls whom you never see again."

"Oh, well, don't then"

Ben Adams at 21 had performed his social duties with great zest. Four years later he was still heart whole, and beginning to take a purely fraternal interest in blushing debutantes. He danced less and went to the opera alone or with his friend Rutland a confirmed bachelor of 28. With entire resignation young Adams acted as usher at many fashionable weddings, and without a sigh saw Catherine, Kate and Kittyled down the aisle by other men. And so he approached his thirties and within a year of them leaned idly over the piazza railing at Lake Winnipaka, and declared to his sister that "Robinson Crusoe" was the luckiest fellow of his acquaintance. Give me a desert isle for a summer sojourn. What would refresh a man like goin' back to savagery!

"I don't think it would be enough of a change to benefit some I know," laughed her sister. "Well, Ben, all I can say is, you are very different from what you used to be."

In the meanwhile the boat below, pushed off and Adams followed it with his eyes, chiefly because it would have been more trouble to look another way. The young lady in the stern was Miss Josephine Vail, and the boy at the oars was her 12-years-old brother. Josephine was a young lady of views, supported by more or less logic and by what some thought an extremely pretty face. Her enemies—but she had none—would have said that while she despised conventionalities no one was more annoyed when obliged to disregard them; and while she resented the protecting limitations of her sex, she was quite willing to accept the attentions based on the theory of their existence. Her father said one day: "Nothing would take the kinks out of our Josephine like settling down with a good husband." The young lady took it in high dudgeon, and went away meekly to wonder if it were true. On this particular July morning Josephine accepted her brother Tom's service as oarsman, not because she was not perfectly well able to row herself, but because it would keep Tom out of mischief.

"Don't rock the boat, Tom. It does n't frighten me, but I can't read."

There was a pause.

"Row near the bank, in the shade, Tom."

Another long pause.

"Say, sis," said Tom at length, "now we're off, I'll tell you where we're going."

"Where you're going? Why, you're going to take me out for a row."

"Not much. I'm going two miles about to see some fellows who are camping out."

"And going to take me? I think you are mistaken, sir. Give me these oars."

"No you don't. Leave 'em alone, and sit still."

"Tom turn this boat instantly, or I'll ——"

"What'll you do? Come, now; you sit still, or I'll——"

"Tom, there's the Desert Isle just ahead. Don't run into it. Be careful; you're going straight forward to it."

"We might land there," he said, blandly.

"To be sure we might," said his sister, glad of anything to divert him from the first scheme.

"All right, just as you say."

Tom turned his boat toward the great rock which lifted its broad back out of the water. It was fitly called the Desert Isle, for its few square feet of surface supported not so much as a blade of grass or a bit of moss.

"Hop out," said Tom; "I've got to see to the boat. I guess you can climb up to the top easy enough."

"Of course I can," said Josephine; "as if I needed your help, you little monkey."

In a moment she stood at the top of the rock and in another moment a derisive laugh came from below.

"Good-by, Jo; I hope you'll enjoy yourself. I'll see you later."

Plato says: "A boy is the most vicious of wild beasts." Plato and Miss Vail were of one opinion on that point. She looked about her and took in the situation. She was monarch of about twenty-five feet of rough grey rocks, the sides of which descended abruptly to the water. Perched high on this pedestal, her figure stood out against the sky in bold relief. A book and parasol were her only accessories, for by some happy inspiration she had clung to these. The sun was high in the heavens, but its hot rays were mercifully tempered by a soft breeze on the lake. Josephine seated herself, raised her parasol and opened her book. She faced the probability that at least two hours of noonday solitude were before her. The philosophical course of action was to make the best of it. But what a situation to be discovered! She remembered with satisfaction that a large party had gone on a picnic to-day, and the dowagers left behind were not given to boating at high noon. She tried to think how she should laugh it off if any body should see her, but under the most cheerful aspect she seemed to herself a little ridiculous spectacle. To be ridiculous in a good cause had in it an element of heroism, but the present situation was one of unmitigated absurdity, and Josephine Vail always felt heroic rather than the comic to be her forte. On a tears of real vexation started as her head began to throb in sympathy with the hot pulsation of the air about her.

An hour had dragged its length when Josephine suddenly lifted her head and listened painfully. A man's voice singing and the splash of oars, and, yes, in an instant, a boat swung slowly around the bend. One man sat in it, lazily singing.

"It's that blase creatrue who watched us off this morning," thought Josephine. "It's a type I detest. And to think he should see me here! It's really more than I can endure." The girl looked with envy on the tortoise which slipped easily from the base of the rock into the water as he heard the disturbing sound of oars.

"I hope he'll have the good taste to suppose I came here of my own free will. He wouldn't think of interfering with me, I hope. What! I believe he's coming straight toward me."

Josephine turned the leaves of her book with an interest that grew every moment more intense. But at length decency required some recognition of the nearing boat. The young man was rowing now as if he had renewed interest in life. He was soon at the base of the rock.

"I beg your pardon," he said, as he raised his hat: "can I be of any service to you?"

"You are very kind, sir. You find me in a very absurd condition."

"You have evidently been shipwrecked. Are you the sole survivor?"

"No, not shipwrecked, but put ashore and abandoned by a cruel tyrant of a brother. To tell you the truth, sir, I am the victim of a practical joke. My little brother has left me here while he goes farther up the lake to visit some friends who are camping there."

"I beg you will make use of my boat, then, to return. I will come up to you in one moment."

Leaping out of his boat before Miss Vail could say a word, he drew it up on a low shelf of the rock and quietly reached her side.

"Let me help you," the young man said, with such a firm assurance of good breeding, that she made no resistance or attempt at independence, but accepted the proffered aid in a quiet, matter-of-course way.

"Your boat! your boat, sir," she suddenly cried. It was too late. The rising breeze drove the water with such force against the rock as to dislodge the boat, and before Adams could grasp it, it was tilting about, a half a dozen yards away.

The two looked at each a moment and then laughed, though both were conscious of its being questionable taste.

Adams sobered and said: "Can you ever forgive me, Miss—"

"Miss Vail. I am Miss Vail."

"And I am Mr. Adams. Can you be magnanimous enough to forgive me?"

"That is the question I should ask you."

"Ah, you evade mine. At any rate I shall never forgive myself. A worse bit of bungling I never saw. The truth is, Miss Vail, I have had very little experience in rescuing fair ladies. You are the first whose life I have tried to save. I am no hero, as you see."

The genuine annoyance of her companion roused the compassion of Josephine, and she began to talk to him with a desperate cheerfulness and acceptance of the situation.

"What a cold-blooded little villain that brother of yours must be, Miss Vale, to desert you in this fashion. I suppose we must throw ourselves on his mercy when he comes back. How are you going to account for me? Consider me your man Friday."

Beneath their light talk ran an undercurrent of more or less bitter meditation on the part of each. Miss Vale shuddered to think what a good story this adventure would make to circulate among her friends, while Adams foresaw how it would add to the conviviality of his club. He began with the fervent wish that he was out of this confounded scrape. He ended, I am obliged to confess, by ceasing to envy Robinson Crusoe, his desert isle, and considering his own far preferable. There was a breeziness about this girl that made him forget the mounting thermometer. She had a way of going to the point, and, moreover, she had a point, two things which Ben Adams told his sister he appreciated in a woman.

In short, by dint of making the best of it, Miss Vail and Adams were both able to express honest surprise when a boat appeared in the distance and in taking out his watch Adams found it to be 3 o'clock.

"Now!" was all Josephine said, but there were conflicting emotions in the monosyllable.

"Hallo-o!" shouted a shrill voice across the water.

"Hallo-o!" called Adams back.

Blank astonishment wiped all expression out of Tom's face at first, but a broad grin finally made its appearance.

"You're a great one, Jo," he muttered "I'd like to know where you wouldn't find a beau. Did he drop down out of the clouds?"

"Hush, sir; you have been a very naughty boy!"

As they rowed home, Adams devoted himself to cultivating the acquaintance of the young scapegrace. The latter proved verry approachable and Adams found no difficulty in persuading him to go fishing the next day.

When they were home at last Josephine took her brother into her room and turned the key.

"Tom, you've treated me very badly to day. What would you give if I would not tell father? You wouldn't like to be sent back to the military school, you know."

"Say, sis, I'll tell you what," and the little wretch gave a wink of immense satisfaction; "if you won't tell on me, I won't tell on you. Honor bright."

"Mrs. Adams," said Mr. Ben Adams to his wife at their wedding reception a year after, "don't you think we might afford to tell people how we met? I never knew a secret kept. I nearly ruined myself buying up that precious brother-in-law of mine. You see, I thought on your account I wouldn't let him tell. I didn't care; I liked it. I had no business to, you say? But I liked it nevertheless. Here are Rutland and his Mary. Let's tell them the story. They know we're going to Lake Winnipaka for our honeymoon."

IN A GYPSY CAMP.

A Graphic Description of a Romany

From the London Telegraph.

Of the younger fry there were as many as half a dozen, four of them girls, whose ages may have ranged from eleven to fourteen, and they were worse clad even than the two women, nor, were the growing boys better covered. As for the little children, whose skins, poor little wretches, for lack of washing, were of the color of light mahogany, several of them were naked as they were born, and there in the midst of an atmosphere pungent with the odor of onions and misty with the steam of the stew, they were all huddled piggledly on the ground some reclining at full length, others squatted "nose and knees" together, discussing their supper with an appetite only to be obtained by a day's toil in a hop garden.

The tent contained no single article of furniture in the ordinary sense of the term. An empty barrel, that apparently had once contained flour, stood in the center with a board across the top of it, and on this stood a shallow brown pan, which contained what had been cooked in the large kettle, and beside it were several loaves of bread. Two of the women presided. The three men squatted cross legged, with a large zinc washing-bowl filled with a savory me-son the ground in their midst, and a four-pound loaf, from which, with their clasp-knives, they hacked a "chunk" as they required it. Plates and spoons there were none. They thrust their wedges of bread into the bowl, and so extracted the broth, and they helped themselves to meat with their dirty fingers, tearing it assunder with their teeth when the piece was too large to put at once in the mouth. In a gallon stone bottle they had beer, which for convenience of drinking was tilted into a yellow pint basin.

Even less ceremony was observed by the children in eating. The female in charge of the bread cut a substantial "round" from a loaf and tossed it to the elder ones as they reclined on the ground, and then the custodian of the stew fished out a piece of meat and thrust it, all hot and reeking at the end of a fork, toward the eager hand held out for it, and the meat was clapped atop the bread, and so, without the aid of a knife, the ration was devoured. The smaller children were served in the same way, but less liberally. When the men had had their bowl replenished and the women had enough the pan, with the remains of the broth and some bread broken up in it, was placed on the ground, and, squealing and greedily hustling each other like so many other little pigs, the gypsy infants made short work of it.

An Audience With Pope Leo.

Leo XIII is now 74 years of age. He is tall, thin and bony. His face is of an ivory tint, and his eyes and lips are very expressive and smiling. He looks very firm. Simeoni says he resembles Voltaire, but Leo XIII's smile is totally different from Voltaire's smile. The Pope wears his age well and walks remarkably straight. He has snow white hair, and very finely marked eyebrows. His eyes are wonderfully intelligent-looking and his voice is extremely harmonious. He speaks several languages as well as any professor of languages. He never says a foolish thing nor does a foolish thing, like poor Pius IX, whose policy was fatal to the Pope's temporal power. He rises very early, and spends the first hours of the day in prayer and generally in his bedroom. At 6 o'clock he says mass. At 8 o'clock he breaks his fast with a cup of chocolate, reading his correspondence all the time. At 9 o'clock he recieves Jacobini and those chiefs of religious societies who may demand audience. At noon he receives those Roman patriarchs who have remained true to him and the ambassadors. At one o'clock he dines, his dinner rarely costing more than two francs, or half a dollar. Once upon a time Popes were great eaters and drinkers, and were given to every kind of extravagance; but Leo XIII is nothing of all this. After dinner he takes a little walk in the Vatican grounds, or he visits the museum, galleiries, etc. Sometimes he is carried in a chair quilted in white satin. He is very fond of the garden and likes to play the gardener at times. He frequently receives visitors in the garden and talks of flowers to them to avoid other subjects. The first and second time I saw him was in the garden. When I went with the pilgrims he was preceded by three noble guards, and at his side was Mgr. Macchi, his secret chamberlain. He wore a wide brimmed hat and a large red cloak. We were presented to him one by one. He looked at us and scrutinized us well. I saw he recognized me, but he treated me like the others—as if he saw me also for the first time. "Are you all Irish?" he said. "I am happy to receive the faithful of that nation!" He looked again at us, as if he would have read into our souls. "Your bishop," he continued "brought me offerings from a people pressed with poverty." Then seeing me still on my knees, he offered me his hand to raise me. "I had thought," he continued, "that the offerings would have decreased; but it was not so. We live on charity" (and here he smiled sadly), "for all we had has been taken from us. Oh! those persecutions!" he cried with a loud voice. "They purify us even when the leaven is pure and immaculate." I seem to see him now. His head looked like a relief on the blue sky. The sun was setting, and he looked up to the sky, as if seeking an inspiration there. "I have heard," he then said, "that notwithstanding the general state of anguish in Ireland, the churches are full of people. May the Lord be praised and blessed, and may my prayers bring peace on the people! Lord hear our prayer and judge us!" He then blessed us, and the audience was finished. I have never seen so much power united to so much simplicity. At 4 o'clock the pope resumes his official audience in the Vatican. At 7 o'clock only he takes a little rest, but at 8 o'clock he returns to work in his private rooms where he remains until 10 o'clock, when he retires for the night, not always to sleep, though, for it is during the night that he reads and writes for his own pleasure, his favorite subject being the "Science of St. Thomas," and essays on the work of that saint, which he receives from every part of the world.

The Greatest Iron Works in the World.

From the London News.

Herr Paul Dehn has written a short account of the immense iron works of Krupp in Essen. Krupp's works were founded in 1810. In 1855 the number of his workmen rose to 693, and soon afterward he felt obliged to build dwellings for them. The number of his workmen in 1882 was 10,693, and the number of houses 3,218, in which lived 16,200 souls. The houses contain from two to five rooms, the rent running from about $20 to $55 a year. One successful experiment was a boarding-house for 201 single men, and later for 500 men, providing dinner, with meat four times a week; supper, coffee and butter; the bread they must provide themselves. A large co-operative store, started by F. Krupp, has developed enormously, and monopolized the retail trade of the district. The sick club has existed since 1856, and in 1882 had 11,011 members and a fund of $313,500. Sick-clubs among the workmen's families also exist. There is a sanitary committee in the works.

The works have had a fever hospital since 1871, an infirmary since 1872. The former was transferred to the town of Essen in 1882 for small-pox cases. A disinfection house and apparatus have also been instituted on Dittmar's plan. Baths were put up near the entrance of the works in 1874. In 1876 a life insurance fund was started, and has risen to 1,625 members. A high school, with twenty class-rooms, and a private school, with sixteen rooms, are among Herr Krupp's foundations, and since 1866 five technical schools have been in existence, in which classes for women in household work, &c., are also held, which are now better attended than at first. Secondary schools, both in Essen and Altendorf, near by, are supported by the firm. Work for disabled men and invalids has been instituted since 1876, such as broom making, for the co-operative stores, basket making, &c., in which widows and children are also employed. In one week in September, 1881, the number of people—men women and children—connected with and dependent on Krupp's works was 65,381.

PRESIDENT JACKSON.

Old Hickory and His Crusade Against the National Bank.

Ben Perley Poore's Recollections.

Fifty years since the country was convulsed by the conflict between President Jackson and the United States bank. The bank was a corporation with a capital of $35,000,000, and it had branches in many of the states. It was the sole fiscal agent of the United States government, and the public funds were deposited in the vaults of the bank and of its branches. Five of the directors were appointed by the United States government, and the others were leading Philadelphians. The president was Nicholas Biddle, a gentleman of rare accomplishments and high character, and he had fortified himself by making loans to leading editors in different parts of the country, and to distinguished impecunious politicians. The bank was very prosperous and its stock was in demand at a high premium, when Isaac Hill, of New Hampshire, then an auditor in the treasury department at Washington, became offended with Mr. Mason, president of the branch bank at Portsmouth, N. H., and demanded his removal.

This was refused, and Mr. Hill lost no time in enlisting the president in a crusade against the bank. "Old Hickory" had just squelched nullification in South Carolina, and he turned eagerly to square off against a new foe. Congress disregarding the president passed a bill rechartering the bank after the expiration of its charter in 1836 Jackson not only voted the bill, but he had the public funds withdrawn from the United states bank and its branches, and transferred to various State banks. This forced Mr. Biddle to contract the business of the United States bank to the extent of the average amount of public money held by it on deposit. Agitation and alarm prevailed throughout the country: paralysis seized on every branch of trade; the notes of State banks depreciated; stocks fell from 10 to 40 per cent; real estate declined; manufactures were suspended, and large numbers of laborers were discharged without any means of support. "Old Hickory" seemed to revel in the din of the contest, and to enjoy the fierce invectives heaped upon him in all quarters, asserting that all this distress was the work of "Nick Biddle and the bank." He and his friends declared it had dabbled in corn and stocks, that it had made donations to roads and canals, that it had built houses to rent and sell, that it had suborned the public press and stooped to corruption, and that it should be closed at once.

The friends of the bank, equally violent, accused the president of open and daring usurpation. After having, in defiance of the constitution and laws, assumed the control of the executive and judicial branches of the government, of the army and of the navy, he now sought to seize the public purse, as Julius Cæsar had seized the public treasury at Rome. The merchants in different cities finding themselves on the verge of bankruptcy sent deputations to Washington to remonstrate with the president.

One of these delegations, from the city of New York, bearing a petition signed by 6,000 merchants, went to Washington, headed by Mr. James G. King. Visiting the white house, they were admitted into the president's private office where they found him seated at a table writing, with a long clay pipe in his mouth, which he was industriously smoking. After courteously greeting them, Mr. King began in a dignified manner, to state the object of the visit. He had said but a few words when General Jackson interrupted him by saying: "Mr. King, I believe you are a son of Rufus King?" "I am, sir," was the answer. "Well, sir," exclaimed the president in an angry voice, gesticulating widely: "Rufus King was always a Federalist, and I suppose you take after him. You talk about insolvency? What do you come to me for? Go to Nicholas Biddle. He has all the money. He has millions of species in his vaults at this moment lying idle, and yet you come to me to save the merchants of your city from breaking. I tell you, gentlemen, it's all politics, and I do not intend to change my position." The delegation retired, feeling glad, as one of them afterwards observed, that he had not kicked them down stairs.

All through the summer of 1833 the fight went on, to be continued for several years. Mr. Biddle, seeking to save himself by cotton speculations, lost the entire capital of the bank, plunging thousands into bankruptcy. He retired to his rural home, on the banks of the Delaware, unable to withstand the storm of obloquy that assailed him in Philadelphia. His bearing was calm and dignified as in his proudest days, when he was the financial autocrat of the Western Hemisphere, and now "none so poor to do him reverence." Jackson was revenged by the failure of the state banks, which plunged the country into financial ruin, but he remained the idol of the people. He had killed the "monster," and he retained the gratitude of the people even through the inflation of 1836, the bankruptcy of 1837, and the hopeless business depression of the five following years.

The Population of Paris.

From the Italian Times.

An analysis of the population of Paris just published gives very singular statistics as to the inhabitants of the gayest city in Europe. It seems, also for its size, to be the most industrious. The proportion in which the working classes exceed those who live on their own incomes is the more remarkable as Paris is the recognized center of expenditure and extravagance for all France. There are no cities that hold to the capital the same relative position that Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham occupy relatively to London. More than half a million of Parisians are employed in commerce, trade and banking operations, while of the artisan class there are considerably more than a million and a quarter. The liberal professions seem to occupy but a small proportion of the population, All combined do not amount to 200,000, and in the subdivisions the prominence is, quite different to what it would be with us. The great majority are in the public service, which employs more than medicine, law, and divinity all combined. But, after the public service, it is art that gives employment and livelihood to the greatest number of Parisians. Forty-two thousand get their income from this branch of industry. The doctors come after. Medicine, in its branches, of course, including chemists and compounders and venders of medicine. Then comes the law, with its 16,000, votaries from judge to bailiff. Literature figures very low on the list, for, grouped with science and journalism, it gives employment to only 11,000 people, while all the clergy of all the persuasions amount to about half the number. On the whole, Paris would seem to be more industrious, more artistic, less literary, and less religious than the ordinary visitor would suppose.

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps was born in Boston and christened May Gray for an intimate friend of her mother's, but at the death of her mother, when she was eight years old, Elizabeth Stuart, her mother's name, was given her.

EVENING SONG.

Behind the hilltop drops the sun,
The curled heat falters on the sand;
While evening's ushers, one by one,
Lead to the guests of twilight land.

The bird is silent over head,
Below the beast has lain him down;
Alone the marbles watch the dead,
Alone the steeples guard the town.

The south wind feels its amorous course,
To cloistered sweets in thickets found;
The leaves obey its tender force,
And stir 'twixt silence and a sound.

PATSY CONG'S GHOST.

BY WILLIAM BLACK.

It was a clear-shining day in April; we were on a small blue lake, set far away among the sterile brown moors of Connemara; and the long salmon-rod lay over the gunwale of the boat, idly trailing behind it forty yards of line and a phantom minnow. Indeed, the day was much too fine for proper fishing; one might as well have thrown a fly over the wood pavement in Pall Mall; it was a day rather for laziness and conversation and an inquiry into the mysteries of existence, if haply one or other of my companions had chanced to encounter any of these in this remote and solitary and silent part of the county. But Patsy did not look like a believer, somehow. He was a small, red-headed Celt, with shrewd winking, gray-blue eyes; and there was frequently a sort of quiet, sardonic humor running through his speech, accompanied now and again by a good-natured grin that overspread the little, pinched, sunburnt face. Moreover, Patsy had seen the world. In former years he had tried his luck in America; had been employed on the Union Pacific railway as far west as Council Bluffs; had had a turn at the Pittsburg iron works, and was now returned to his native district with a wide and general knowledge of mankind. On the other hand, his neighbor at the bow—Tim Mulcahy by name—was nothing but a ghost and an echo. He was a small farmer who came down from his croft in the hills to eke out his living in this way—a characterless, white-faced, depressed-looking, amiable creature, who stared at his boots, lazily pulled at his oar and limited his conversation to saying ditto to Patsy. "That's so, Patsy." "You're right, Patsy." "Not wan less than fourteen salmon did he catch that day." "Your father was a good man, Patsy; he wouldn't tell a lie for hardly annything." "That's true for you, Patsy; the like of thim for minnows I never saw."

Now, at the head of this small lake that we were slowly and idly rowing round and round stood a long, low cottage situated in the middle of a patch of trees—lilac-tinted, leafless birches and sparkling dark-green hollies. In summer no doubt this must be a very charming place; even now the situation was picturesque enough—the still waters of the lake in front; the trees along the curving shore; and then rising far behind into the pale blue sky the vast and lonely and arid mountains known as the Twelve Pins of Binabola. The prettily situated cottage, however, was unmistakably empty. The windows were barred up; there was a look of desolation around; not a sound of any kind came from that scattered grove of birch and holly.

"The very place to be haunted by a leprechaun, isn't it, Patsy?"

"Is it Barney Joyce your honor manes?" says the usually loquacious Patsy; "the man that comes to look after the house? Well, now, your honor wouldn't believe what a great soldier that Barney is—oh, he is the mighty fine soldier, by the fire. Sure the battles he'll fight, and the campaigns and the stratagims, and the generals and the marchings, and the counter-marchings! I niver heard his equal, and the divil a foot has he iver stirred out of Connemara!"

"But when the house is empty, Patsy, isn't there a ghost or a goblin somewhere about?"

"Well, indeed, the fairies used to come there," says Patsy, with indifference. "They used to say that, but thim ould stories are all nonsinse."

"They're all nonsinse, Patsy, thim ould stories," says Echo at the bow.

"Did you ever happen to hear what they called the king of the fairies?" I asked, curious to know whether the Dun Fierna of the Blackwater and the South reigned also in these western wilds.

But Patsy was puzzled. Then he turned to Tim Mulcahy, and there was a long consultation in Irish, in the course of which a phrase sounding like Piobara-Shee was twice repeated.

"Had they a fairy piper, then, Patsy?"

"Begob," says Patsy, eagerly, "that was him. The fairy piper was the king of thim; and manny a one has heard him playing in that very house there. I mane that was the ould story, sorr, but sure 'tis all nonsinse."

And now ensued a long and rambling general conversation, which need not be set down here, on the subject of fairies, pishogues, leprechauns and similar kittle-cattle, throughout which Patsy was evidently anxious to show that he had discarded all such superstitions. Was it for one who lived in an age of reason—who had worked on the Union Pacific—to heed such folly? Nevertheless, Patsy was frankly disposed to admit that strange things might have happened—probably did happen—in former times.

"There was a power of witchery in this country in the ould days," said Patsy, gravely shaking his head; "yis, sorr, there was a power of witchery in this country in the ould days; but 'tis all gone away. Sure the people are turned more cunning now."

And then he added, more gloomily:

"But maybe there's more going on than we know."

By this time it had become pretty obvious that Patsy's eagerness to disclaim all belief in ghosts and witchery and the like was assumed—partly, no doubt, in prudent deference to the general opinion of a scientific and skeptical age; but partly, perhaps, because a man who had been to Pittsburg felt bound to pose before a poor creature like Tim Mulcahy, who had never left his native mountains. And so, to find out whether Patsy might not have some reciprocal confidences to unfold, I told him my own ghost story, which isn't much of a ghost story, after all. That a lad of thirteen or fourteen should look in at the open door of a dining-room and behold there a woman seated before the fire; that he should carefully regard her shawl and hat and gown, wondering who she could be; that he should forthwith go and ask the other people in the house and bring them to the door of the room only to discover that the chair was vacant, and that by no possibility could any stranger have been there and left; and then to find that this portent was followed by no calamity whatever—neither a funeral nor a wedding nor anything—this, it must be confessed, was a poor and weak ghost story, which I should be ashamed to say a word about to the Psychical society. But it deeply interested Patsy; and he was eager to know whether it was a real ghost; and when I answered that it was only an optical illusion, he remained silent for a time, and then repeated his wise aphorism—

"Maybe there's more going on than we know."

Again Patsy was silent for a time; and then, rather with the air of a man who is compelled to confess something against his will, he said:

"Well, sorr, now that we're on it, I will tell you what happened to me; but I don't like spaking of it—the less that's said the better—but I will tell you what happened to me, sorr; and it's many the year since I tould any one the story. I was nineteen at the time. My mother and me, we had gone to the fair of Letternabinch to sell two sheep; and there we were all day, and the divil a bit could we sell the sheep. 'No matter, Patsy,' said my mother to me, at the end of the day, 'you'll buy yourself the pair of new boots all the same, for who knows when we'll next be in at Letternabinch from the farm.' And so I bought the pair of boots, and mighty proud I was of thim, sorr, you may be sure; and I kept them on during the evening, 'until it was time for us to set out to walk back to the farm, for the divil an offer could we get for the sheep. Well, now, sorr, about tree miles from Letternabinch, or maybe 'tis tree miles and a half, there's a wood—and a dark wood it was that night, though it was a moonlight night and the road as white as silver; and says I, 'Mother, the new boots are hurting my feet; wait a minute now and I'll take them off.' But she went on with the sheep; and I was sitting down at the edge of the wood taking off the boots, whin there was a noise and something rushed at me from the wood and hit me a slap and went by. Sure I hope your honor'll niver see anything like that terrible beast. 'Twas in the road now, and I was up, with the boots in one hand and a little bit of stick in the other; and I kept threatening it when it came near to attack me. I called out to my mother, but she was frightened too; she wouldn't look back. 'Come an, Patsy, come an!' she cried to me; and I durstn't run, for fear of the beast."

"But what was it like, Patsy?"

"Well, sorr, I will make you sinsible of it; though I was all of a thrimble, for it followed me along the road, and sometimes 'twas in the ditch, and when I couldn't see it I heard it, and my mother heard it, and she was as terrified as I was. 'Twas about four or five feet long—yis, sorr, maybe five feet it was—and red, and when it put up its head 'twas like to strike at me like a snake, but I had a bit of a stick in my hand and I kept that turned to it. Maybe it had legs but I could see none, and the body—well, now, the body was about the thickness of a thin dog, long and thin it was—and the noise it made was terrible, terrible. Well, now, sorr, maybe it was a fancy. I understand that. Maybe it was something in my own head—like a fever. But manny and manny is the time I have thought over it, and what bothers me intirely is that my mother should have heard it when it was growling at me in the ditch."

Even now the recollection of this strange thing seemed to overshadow Patsy with fear and trembling. His eyes were distraught; and he spoke like one speaking to himself, and describing something that he actually saw before him.

"'Twan't the size of it, your honor, that frightened me; sure it couldn't reach at me higher than the knee, when it put up its head as if it would strike me; but there was something terrible about it that made me tremble from me head to me foot. And when I put down my stick it would keep back, running along by the side o' me, but always wid its head turned to me, and threatening, and sure I was afraid to strike it, if I had had the power, but I was wake with the thrimbling; and my mother she wouldn't look back—'twas a God's truth, your honor, I never was in such a fright as that night. And thin, when it left the road for the while, I knew it was there still all the time, by hearing of its growling at me; and at such times whin it was in the ditch I would have hurried on faster, and got up to my mother, but my legs were wake with the fright, and sure I was afraid it would come up behind me if I was to run. There now, sorr, there may be an explanation—I will not say no to that; may be 'twas a kind of fever in my head; but sure that couldn't have made my mother hear the beast whin it was growling at me in the ditch, and made her hurry on, too, for she was too frightened to look back!"

"But you haven't finished the story, Patsy; what became of the beast?"

"Well, 'twas a terrible night, your honor, and that's a fact. I thought we would never get to the farm, though my mother kept ahead of me with the sheep, and I was afraid to overtake her for fear of giving the beast a chance at me. Sure I think it must have been between one and two in the morning when we got up to the farm; and the beast kept following me—sometimes in sight, and sometimes in the ditch—all the way, until we were nearly to the door; and then it turned and went away down the hill again, and I saw it as far as the lake, but there I lost sight av it. Divil a wink of sleep did I get that night, you may be sure, sorr; and the next day my mother cautioned me not to spake of it to anny one, for fear of bad luck.

"'Twas six months after—six or seven months after. My mother and me we had not been speaking about what had happened on the Letternabinch road, for the fright was on me for manny and manny a day; and my mother would never spake of it either, for fear of bad luck. Well, sorr, one evening I was going into the house—'twas about supper time—and I was thinking of nawthin' but that; and the door inside was a bit open. Well, sorr, there was a woman standing talking to my mother—well, I knew the woman, she lived at Maskene—that was about eight miles further on the road—and my mother was asking her to sit down and rest herself, for 'twas a long way to go and she had not passed our way for manny and manny a day. 'Thank ye kindly, Mrs. Cong,' says she, 'but 'tis a lonely road to Maskene, and I am frightened to be out after dark since what happened to me at Letternabinch.' Be gob, sorr, ye may suppose I listened thin, and her back was to me so that she couldn't see me, and my mother couldn't see me nayther because of the door. Well, sorr, what she said was that two years before she had been in the market at Letternabinch and she had a power o' things to carry, and so she waited for the night mail car, that would put her down within a mile or so of Maskene. She was on the back seat of the car and there was no one else but the driver, and 'twas a fine clear night. Well, sorr, she declared that whin they were passing a wood about three miles from Ballynahinch, a terrible beast sprung out of the wood, and sprung right into the car, and stopped there beside her, and the divil a word or a cry could she get out, for the fright that was on her. How long the beast stopped in the car she did not say; nor was she saying anything of what it was like; and my mother seemed too frightened to ask her any questions. But that was the reason she made to my mother for going on in the daylight; and not a minute longer would she stop in the house. Now, sorr, what can any one make of that? That was a year and a half before what happened to me, and at the very same part of the road."

"You hadn't heard the woman's story before, Patsy, and forgotten it? It wasn't the coming to the wood on the Letternabinch road that suddenly brought it back to your mind and frightened you?"

"Aw, the divil a bit, sorr! Sure I asked my mother about it, and 'twas thin for the first time she heard of it, too, though 'twas mighty little you'd get her to spake about it. Well, sorr, that's all I know av it, and 'tis there I'll lave it; but depind on it, sorr, there's more going on than we know."

This, Patsy's favorite maxim, seemed to both his companions so incontrovertible that they acquiesced in silence. As for Patsy himself, he seemed rather glad to get away from those memories. A kind of gloom had hung over him while he was recalling the various particulars; perhaps he shared his mother's fear that no good would come of speaking of such matters. At all events, as soon as he began to talk of legends and stories and superstitions in which he was not personally concerned, he quite recovered his ordinary cheerfulness of tone; indeed when he came to treat of the water-horses that used to haunt these lakes he spoke in quite a jaunty and matter-of-fact way, as if their existence "in the ould days" admitted of no manner of doubt whatever. Of course I was not surprised to find the water-horse myth as common here as it is in my own country, where every other loch has its circumstantial legend; but the curious thing about the Connemara water-horses is that they are reported to have interbred freely with the farm horses around, and that the offspring were put to work on the farm as an ordinary affair. But they were lazy animals, these half-breeds, and not to be depended upon whenever they came near a lake, for then, unless the farmer was on the watch; they would most likely make a bolt for the water, irrespective of what was behind them. In fact, there was a young animal of this uncanny blood employed on a farm belonging to Patsy's uncle, and one day it did make such a bolt, and was only prevented from plunging itself and the car and the driver into a lake by the traces fortunately hitching (how, was not explained) on a rock.

I wonder if it was this same uncle who was the hero of Patsy Cong's next story. By this time, it may be unnecessary to say, I had come to regard my friend Patsy as a rank impostor. His transatlantic experiences may have given him a thin veneer of scepticism, which he thought it fine to parade before the simple dwellers among the hills; but underneath that and deep down in his nature there obviously remained the ineradicable Celtic belief in a mysterious and magical world, just hidden, and no more than hidden, by the visible phenomena around. Patsy was clearly thrown away in Connemara. If only he had belonged to the wealthier classes, if he had been brought up in a library and got his brains bemuddled with neo Platonism and port wine, there is no saying to what eminence he might not have risen as a writer of sentimental history or the constructor of a new ethical system. Here he was tied down to the telling of old wives' tales about water-horses and the like.

"There's more going on than we know," says Patsy, surveying the still blue waters of the lake in an absent kind of way. "I'm sure of that, sorr. It's a positive fact. Maybe I wouldn't beleve all the stories that are tould, but there's something—there's something. There was my uncle, now, that lived at Kincree; and he used to be going down to the say-shore, coortin' the young woman that he was to marry. Well, one evening as he was coming back he stopped to talk to some min that were blasting rocks near the roadside; and I don't know how it was, but there was a quarrel and a fight, and one of the min he takes up the blasting-rod and hits my uncle with it over the head, and there he was, a dead man. Well, sorr, it was about a year after my uncle was killed there that a woman living close by in the neighborhood went out from her cabin with a milking-pail in her hand, and went up the hillside to milk the cows. They saw her go up—more than one saw her go away—and she was quite alone by herself. Well, sorr, she didn't come down again, and they got frightened and they went in search of her, and the divil a sight of her could they find anywhere. Well, now, your honor, this is the story av it; sure, I'm only saying what I was tould about it and what every one about there beleves until this day. 'Twas on the evening of the third day after that that she came down again—looking very quare she was—and she said she had met the man that was murdered the year before—sure, that was my uncle—and he had taken her away with him over the hills, she could not tell where. 'I don't know what to make av it; but 'twas a strange story, annyhow."

"Patsy," remarks one of the two listeners, "was there a bothan dubh in those hills?"

"What's that, sorr?"

"What they call in Scotland a black bothy—an illicit still. Weren't they brewing a little potheen up in the hills, and glad to get the woman to help them for a day or two?"

"I don't know about that, sorr," said Patsy; "but annyhow she was never the same woman after it; no, sorr, there was always something weighing on her mind, and she never got the better of it. I suppose she's dead now."

Here Patsy paused, and had a look round the sky, for there had been some faint indications that we might after all get a breath of wind; and then, still working away at the easy oar, he continued:

"No, sorr, I say nawthin' about thim stories but that they were tould to me. What happened to meself on the Letternabinch road, that was different—begob, I'm not likely to forget that. But there was something that happened to my father that was strange too, and I know he wouldn't tell a lie about it."

"Your father was a good man, Patsy; he wouldn't tell a lie about hardly anything," says the meek chorus.

"'Twas whin I was a boy, but I remimber it," says Patsy. "He was at work on the farm, and my sister had to carry him his dinner, and they sate down on the side of a little hill where it was too rough and rocky for digging—the divil a thing could a spade do wid it. Well, sorr, there was a woman coming along the road that knew my father, and she sate down wid them for a minute or two, to put the basket off her shoulders, and there they were sitting whin they heard people speaking below them inside the hill. Oh, as clear as annything they heard the voices below the ground, so the women tould me, for I met her as I was going to the field not five minutes after. And says she: 'Patsy, ask your father was he hearing annything when your sister and him and me were sitting on the hill?' Well, sorr, I went along and there was my father at his work again; and I went down to him and asked him about what the woman tould me. 'Yes, Patsy, true it is,' says he, 'but it is not a thing to be spaking about;' and he wouldn't answer no more questions. No, sorr, not thin nor at any other time; he would be getting angry wid us when we were after asking him any questions about it. Sure, sorr, there must be somethin' in it. The woman might be making up a story to frighten us childer, but my father wouldn't tell a lie about it. There's something going on, sorr, and that's the truth. It's a positive fact. And if the ould witchery has gone away from the country, since the people are more cunning now, still, there may be other things that we don't know. That's true, sorr; that's a positive fact."

NORWEGIAN POLITICS.

The Struggle in the Norsk Parliament Over the Question of the Powers of the King.

An "Old Norwegian" gives the Chicago Tribune the idea that the real question at issue in the struggle now pending in Norway is: Shall the king have an absolute power to veto a constitutional amendment bill passed by the Storthing, or shall he not? In the constitution there is nothing to the effect that the king should have this prerogative, and there is not a Norwegian who ever dreamed that he would claim it, before he, in the year 1880, tried to veto a bill that was passed three times by the storthing in spite of the fact that the king, under the Constitution, is obliged to accept any bill, including constitutional amendment bills, which passes three successive storthings. The bill in question makes it a duty of the king's councillors to be present and partake in the discussions of the storthing, or the national assembly. The history of this bill is unique and interesting, as its history is also the history of the growth of political Norway from 1824 to the present day. The bill was first introduced by Carl Johan, the grandfather of the present king, in 1821. At that time, however, the representatives of the people in the storthing would not pass it because they were afraid that the ministers, when admitted to the storthing, on account of their superior ability, would be able to force through whatever measure they liked. At that time the Norwegian people were very little used to a free constitution, and the storthing consisted, to a greater extent, of farmers who had only a meager political education. The government did not cease to advise every storthing to pass the bill until 1860. But things have changed. The Norwegian people has grown up to a political manhood, and it sees now in the admission of the ministry into the storthing a means of introducing parliamentarism into the country as it is practiced in England and other European states. The leaders in the storthing now made the old government bill their own, and it was passed by a handsome majority in 1872. Frederik Stang, the prime minister, who in his earlier career, both in pamphlets and in speeches, had defended the measure, now advises the king, Carl XV., to make use of the vetoing power. The measure was, in a somewhat altered shape, again passed by the storthing in 1874, by a new storthing in 1877, and again by a new storthing in 1880. Every time Oscar II., who succeeded his brother in the fall of 1872, vetoed it. The two times he had a right to do it, if not under the constitution, which says (§112) that bills relating to constitutional amendments are to be introduced in one storthing, but must be decided on by the next storthing, which is the outcome of new elections, he had the right which common practice granted him. But the third time it was usurpation. The ministry backed him. The old politician Stang, who is a man of uncommon ability, left the fight that ensued, as it grew too hot for him, and the king made a nameless lawyer from a province town his prime minister. In all Norway there was not a man of note who would serve the stubborn king in his desires to be like James II. and to wield the scepter of a despot. By reason of this political crime—viz: That the responsible ministry, in direct opposition to the constitution of the country, has supported the irresponsible king in his endeavor to thwart the will of the people, the ministry has now been impeached before the supreme tribunal, called Rigsret. Beside this great crime the ministry is also guilty of minor crimes, as alluded to in the Tribune. But the struggle in Norway is not one about trivial matters. It is the great question: Shall the people be and remain the ruler of its own country and force the king to take such men for his counselors as have the confidence of the people; or shall the king, by means of an absolute power to vote, forever be able to thwart the will of the people and choose for his advisers whomever he will, even if they be the most contemptible beings on the face of the earth?

The poet Bornstjerne Bjornson is not, as is the general belief among foreigners, the leader of the Norwegian people and the storthing. Mr. Bjornson has only little political influence. The leader in the people's struggle against the king is Johan Sverdrup, who has been a member of the storthing since 1851. He is backed by several other veteran members. Bjornson, however is a leader of a party whose programme it is that Norway shall have its own pure flag, and not a "union" flag or one in which also Swedish colors are blended. Bjornson and his followers hold that Norway, in spite of the fact that also Sweden has a "union" flag, or one in which Norwegian colors are blended, is not, as long as her ships carry this "union" flag, recognized by the world at large to be an independent and free country, but is considered a province of Sweden. Bjornson proves this by the fact that Norway's great men, and Norwegians on the whole, both in this country and Europe, pass, to a great extent, under the name of Swedes. From this—that such a "pure flag" party exists—comes the talk that many will have their country separated from Sweden. This talk has no foundation whatever. It is the wish of the people that the union of free and independent Norway and free and independent Sweden shall last forever, to the great advantage of both countries.

KAHOKA, MO., Feb. 9, 1880.

I purchased five bottles of your Hop Bitters of Bishop & Co., last fall, for my daughter, and am well pleased with the bitters. They did her more good than all the medicine she has taken for six years. WM. T. MCCLURE.

The above is from a very reliable farmer, whose daughter was in poor health for seven or eight years, and could obtain no relief until she used Hop Bitters. She is now in as good health as any person in the country. We have a large sale, and they are making remarkable cures. W. H. BISHOP & CO.

Merely a Rumor.

CREELSBURG, D. T., Special, Oct. 20.—It is rumored here that telegraphic orders have been received from Washington by the commandant at Fort Totten to send troops to the Turtle Mountain region and drive the Cree Indians and renegades across the international line. The troops, it was thought, would not start before the 30th inst.

"Young man, you can make no better investment than to take the thorough course of training at H. B. Bryant's Chicago Business College. It will pay.

OCTOBER.

Aroused, she leans from rocky mountain height,
And winds afar her clear and mellow horn:
To northern bounds, remote, the call is borne,
And quick responding, mailed in dazzling white
Like ghostly troopers, each for battle dight,
Her scathing frosts assail the serried corn.
Bereft of beauty, withered and forlorn,
Droop golden-rod and asters subtly bright.
The winds, her light-winged archers, swift prevail
O'er painted splendors of the embattled wood,
And riven leaves in summer's blood imbrued
Float helpless, shuddering, on the ruthless gale.
She stands like Gyneth mid her knightly band,
Nor yet to stay the carnage lifts her hand.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

The Open Fireplace.

A writer in the Decorator and Furnisher pays this tribute to the open fireplace, which is just now coming into prominence as an old fashion revived: If there were no other thing in the æsthetic renaissance to be thankful for, its restoration of fireplaces to our homes would entitle it to respectful consideration. Open fires have more than an æsthetic influence. As centers for the home circle or family semi-circle that forms them, and as disseminators of cheerfulness and content, it may be claimed that they serve an ethic purpose. The snapping, fragrant back log, or the genial glow of cannel coal, mantled in limpid flames of blue, dispose one to profitable reflections, to generous and sympathetic feelings and to a placidity of mind that was for a time supposed by the rushing public of this nineteenth century to be one of the lost arts. Gassy furnaces, cast iron stoves, and such poor pretexts as kerosene and gas radiators can never impart more than physical warmth. Mental caloric and those airy fancies, delicate as the flames that give them cause, are not to be evolved by hugging stoves and sitting over registers. The cheerful effect of visible fire gives it decorative value, and it is doubtless for this reason that appropriate settings for andirons and grates have recently invited the attention of architects and designers. Fires were almost the sole decorations, if they may be so regarded, of early settler's homes in this country, and many an old farmhouse would be dismal enough to-day, but for its cosy hearth, the focus of family heart warmth. Yet a certain severe beauty was seen in many of these fireplaces of yore, and such beauty as they possessed is very justly perpetuated. Their brass furnishing was a more tasteful concession to the appropriate than might have been looked for among the early New Englanders, for brass approximates more nearly to flame, in color and brightness than any other metal. The glitter of the flames was cheerfully repeated also in rows of pictured tile, the religious austerity of whose designs was odd when seen in contrast with a rousing fire that ought to melt austerity out of any company.

Even when it flashes from a rude cavern of brick and mortar, a fire may be regarded as the eye of an apartment, giving cheer and animation to what might else be cold and lifeless. It naturally attracts the human eye, and is, therefore, a fitting spot about which to group objects of attractiveness and beauty. Antiquity of decoration is not amiss, so the designs be cheerful; but let not admiration for antiquity betray us into admiring antiquity for its own sake. Select what is beautiful and useful in it, for a catholic spirit is the spirit of the time; but do not, as one house owner of my acquaintance has done, hang the ancestral pots and kettles upon a crane over the drawing room fire, showing them complacently to visitors as things to respect.

Men Dressmakers.

Men simply cut after a fashion, says a New York dressmaker. That is, we have our fitters, and after they measure and fit a lady the tailor cuts the material. You see they have a system that is well liked at present, as coatings and jackets are all the go. We have tried to learn their system of cutting, but would you believe it, these men cutters will not allow one of us girls in or near the room where they work, not even the madam. They have combined to prevent females learning their trade. We have had dresses here from men's hands to rip up and make over from very wealthy ladies. Why, I can tell a dress cut by a man on the street as soon as I get my eye on it. The shoulders are usually cut too short, a certain elasticity about the body is wanting, and the bust is always too tightly drawn. They may get along with the coatings now coming in, but with suitings and dresses they will never succeed. Now, for instance, how do you imagine that young misses or ladies slightly deformed are to be fitted, or old ladies who are growing out of shape? Why, I could go on Broadway or Fifth avenue any afternoon and point out to you young women with beautiful shapes who, when they take off their dresses and skirts, are all one-sided or ill-formed in some way. Many have one shoulder or hip broader than the other. Some have no bust, others are simply like two sticks tied together, while others still have high shoulders or necks too long or perhaps too short. These and other little defects in nature about the figure of customers in our line cannot be improved except by the skill and attendance of women. When I think of it I really feel as though these men who are coming into our trade imagine females have no shame at all in this country. They may think so in Paris, but here they will find they are mistaken. A good many women think because their dresses have Worth's name upon them it's a great thing. But that is not now always the case. There are some places on the Bowery and Grand street where you can get suits with the Worth stamp upon them. They make the dresses themselves and stamp in the name just to catch the eye.

"There, you see that young lady going out the front door?" interrupted the gossipy girl, as she stopped in her conversation to point to a handsome, tall young lady about entering her carriage at the door. "That is Miss ——, the daughter of a well-known banker. She displays a lovely figure, but really she is one of the hardest to fit I ever saw. She seems like Mrs. Langtry, all shoulders and big bones. In fact, everything about that young lady is made up by us fitters and dressmakers, yet when she walks out you would imagine her figure is perfect, but it's all the same, except to the experienced eye of a dressmaker."

Jerseys for October.

The fashions for children continue to favor plaited Scotch plaid skirts, to be worn with dark cloth or velvet jackets. These are generally open in front over a puffed piece of goods. The same suits for little boys have the puffing replaced by a vest or an embroidered plastron. Boys from six to seven years of age wear plaited skirts and jackets, with long scalloped basques or sailors' garments, which fall loose and full over the skirt. After seven years of age trousers are worn. They are buttoned or gathered around the knees, and the suit is completed with a jacket or English blouse.

Jerseys are also much favored for children's wear. They are in all colors, over plaited or plain skirts, with broad sashes taken around the lower part of the waist. A suit for a little girl from eight to eleven years of age is of copper-colored ottoman, trimmed with chenille. The skirt is box-plaited. The ottoman jacket opens down the front, in shawl shape, over a plastron trimmed with chenille. On either side of the plastron are revers. In front of the jacket, fastened to its border, are two rounded ends, each having a pocket covered with chenille. The back and small side piece are tight-fitting, and form on the lower part a kind of puffing trimmed with chenille fringe. A piece of ottoman ribbon starts from under each pocket and is tied on the side in a bow. The large collar is covered with chenille. On the neck and point of the plastron are ribbon loops.

A suit for a girl twelve years of age is of "hussard" blue cloth and plaid woolen goods. On the lower border of the false round skirt are two narrow blue cloth plaitings. The other part of the skirt is covered with a deep plaid puffing, with a shirred head, surmounted by a second puffing, which reaches to the waist. The tight-fitting cloth jacket has one dart in front and opens in shawl shape over a plaited piece, which is shirred on the neck. There is only one small side piece, which is cut with the back in large squares. The center pieces extend in two long ends, one of which falls straight, while the other is slightly draped. A piece of ribbon is taken from under the back and side seams, and is fastened to the lower part of the right side in front.

Tea Gowns.

Tea gowns this season are most varied and superb, making the question of a choice no easy one, even for those who own the weightiest of purses. Among a large number of newly imported robes was a very beautiful one made of pale violet cashmere. In the back was a wide Watteau pleat, down the center of which ran an embroidery of English violets and blush rose-buds, exquisitely wrought in delicately shaded silks. Over the shoulders was laid a coachman's cape, bordered with the floral embroidery. A second tea gown, fashioned in similar style, was made of silver gray satin foulard, embroidered in pure white roses and buds, and lavishly trimmed with wide ruffles of Oriental lace. Another very stylish gown was made of pink silk shot with silver, with a Watteau back and a Marie Antoinette fluted plastron and collar. The open sleeves were lined with pale rose-colored merveilleux, and the drapings were caught up with rose-colored satin ribbons and large silver buckles. A handsome matinee was made of plain black satin lined with cardinal and hand-painted with clusters of cardinal red geranium blossoms. For ordinary wear were scores of princess robes made of cashmere, vigogne, limousine and broche fabrics, trimmed severally with ficelle lace, satin pipings, colored Spanish lace and bands of bias velvet; a very attractive dress for morning wear being a dark wine-colored cashmere, cut into blocks around the bottom, with a deep ruffle of pleated wine satin set beneath. The bodice was trimmed to correspond.

Fashion Notes.

In the matter of the coiffure the interest just now is not so much directed to the style in which the hair is worn as to the fancy ornaments which adorn these tresses. Jeweled-headed pins, sparkling gem-studded daggers, and odd ornaments showing most beautiful devices in heraldry, wrought in silver and gold and often set in diamonds, are among the novelties; and in floral symbols the single fleur-de-lys—resembling the iris—is a favorite hair ornament for ladies with blonde locks.

For the cool days of autumn are shown an immense variety of fine serge costumes, plain velvet being a very favorite material for trimming them. Gold and silver braids are also much used for the purpose and are very effective. The bodices of these costumes, especially when tailor-made, are generally accompanied by waistcoats when metallic braids are used as the trimmings, the gilet often being striped with the fine lines of either gold or silver, these meeting in the center in a downward point, most advantageous to the figure.

The latest productions of the glass manufacturers of Munich are reproductions of fine sixteenth-century glass pieces of Moorish, Spanish, and Venetian origin, in the form of urns, chalices, plates, caraffes, and vases, the originals of which are found at present only in the Art Museum of Berlin and the Louvre in Paris. The decorations of these pieces consist of enameling sections of colored glass on white or tinted, with intaglio traceries between, filled with gold. The effect is artistic, marvellous, and beautifully barbaric.

Cameo glass is the finest, most artistic, and costly decorative ware that is brought to this country. It is made in England and France. The pieces are blown in two layers, one of tinted, red, blue, rose, amethyst, or pale green glass, the other pure white; the decorations are then cut out of the white layer in cameo effects, leaving the designs on the tinted surface. Small plates of cameo glass cost over $100 each, and the smallest pieces produced bring $30.

For those to whom they are becoming, high-crowned felt hats are to be all the wear this autumn, trimmed with the wings of any bird one may fancy—grouse, pheasant, or partridge, duck, snipe, pigeon or swallow. Upon some hats five or six wings are arranged perpendicularly around the crown, with the head of one large bird just in front.

Amber-tinted velours of long, strong pile, with marabout fringes of the same color form many elegant sorties de bal, the ornamentation consisting of passementeries of brown and old gold silken cords, outlined with gold soutache; pendants of rat-tail chenille, showing gold and brown, complete the decorative effect.

New shoulder capes are cut to produce a full epaulette effect on the shoulders.

Capes or large collars are worn on tight walking jackets by young ladies.

Dark Russian furs—black fox, hare, otter and sable—will be much worn.

Imported hats and bonnets are noticeably larger than those of last fall.

A singular English fancy is to combine ashes of roses with gold color.

Velveteen is the favorite fabric for retrimming old woollen dresses.

The blouse redingote will be the favorite with tall and slender women.

Bisque figures, unless they are very fine, are excessively vulgar.

Dots, macaroons and stars are popular designs in wool broches.

Tiny checks are fashionable in both silks and woolen fabrics.

Combinations of stuffs are as popular for cloaks as for dresses.

Combinations of brocade and shot glace are very fashionable.

Sometimes a fresh trimming suffices to transform a dress.

Gray felt is the rage of the moment for hats and bonnets.

Redingotes for winter wear have short shoulder capes.

White china is again in favor for dinner and tea sets.

Furriers say that sable is revived as a fashionable fur.

Terra cotta color is still popular on the other side.

New winter mantles are rather long than short.

The blouse bodice is in request for young girls.

Shoulder capes are in favor at present.

Fall mantles are short in the back.

The Oyster Season.

The season is now fully opened in New York and the oyster houses are all doing a good business. The increase in this traffic is certainly remarkable, and even within the past five years it has gained 300 per cent. This is shown in the change in the vessels thus employed. Formerly they were sloops and schooners, but now one line of steamers brings 5,000 baskets per week. This city alone consumed last year 8,000,000 bushels, and to this is added the enormous country trade. The capital invested in the oyster trade in this city is estimated at $20,000,000. There are 3,000 oyster houses in New York, employing 10,000 persons, all earning good wages. The woman who keeps the oyster soup stall at Washington market sells 500 bowls per day at 10 cents, but a stew costs 25 cents. She is getting rich out of this traffic. Oyster houses now make smaller profits than in former times, but they make up the difference by increase of business. The shells are carted away and used for lime, which is purchased by farmers for their land. The busiest time for the business is in the evenings, and particularly after 9 o'clock, when appetite revives and every one who finds a quarter in his pocket is tempted to spend it. Oyster eating is the most harmless form of evening dissipation, and hence escapes that censure which is so often awakened by gaslight habits. Oysters are most nutritious when eaten raw, but the stew is the most popular method, and oyster cooks are now earning very handsome wages.

Jay Eye See and His Owner.

New York Hour: Jay Eye See will probably go into winter quarters early next month. Mr. Case has, since his departure from New York, received many offers for the horse, despite the prohibitive price of $50,000 which was placed on him, but is determined to keep him. People in a position to know say that his winnings foot up to very nearly $200,000. On the morning after the "young 'un" beat St. Julien, he bought a $1,000 camel's hair shawl for his wife, in a well known dry goods house, and offered in payment a check for $1,500. The proprietor naturally hesitated about accepting it. "I don't know you, sir," he said.

"My name is Case, of Racine, Wisconsin," he replied.

The merchant looked blank.

"I'm the owner of Jay Eye See," added Mr. Case, with a smile.

The man of yard-sticks jumped up.

"I beg your pardon; I did not know that."

Mr. Case then drew his wallet, which was full to overflowing with checks, ranging in value from $800 to $4,000.

"See if you can find a check among them," said Mr. Case, "whose maker you know."

A suitable one was found, and as Mr. Case left he said: "That is all Jay Eye See money."

Monkeying with the Pope.

There are reports at Rome that many private documents, referring to the Papacy, have disappeared from the Vatican. It is feared that the Italian government may take under its protection those treasures of the Holy See which have been collected with the people's money. To these treasures belong libraries containing more than 180,000 codices, 100,000 manuscripts, among them 56 Gospels in the Oriental tongues, written on scrolls. To meet the emergency the clergy are said to have been hiding first the archives of extraordinary ecclesiastical affairs; second, the archives of the Propaganda Fide; third, the archives of the Inquisition, and fourth, the archives of the congregation of the Index Expurgatorius. These documents were once kept in the palace of the Quirinal, but were transferred to the Vatican by a papal emissary, who persuaded the commander of the Italian troops that the said documents were simply baptismal registers, etc., without historical value. Some of them are now well guarded in the old tower near Anagni. The letters of Pope Alexander VI. are still in the Vatican, together with other papers which the pope would never voluntarily place at the disposal of the public. Many of these documents are hidden on secret shelves in walls, and behind other papers.

Dr. Robert Hunter of Chicago has just published a very valuable pamphlet on the proper treatment of Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma and Consumption. Sent free to all who are afflicted. Address Dr. R. Hunter, 96 State street, opposite Marshall, Field & Co., Chicago.

THE FAST NOBILITY.

How a British Earl and His Wife Went Through Millions.

The Earl of Lonsdale, who died in England the other day, was only twenty-six years of age, but managed to make some stir in the fashionable world. He was one of the richest peers in England, one of the hardest drinkers, one of the most reckless gamblers and an unrivaled spendthrift.

When the earl succeeded to the title and estates in 1879, he was not quite of age. He had a considerable amount of ready money to start with, and an income of over $350,000 a year, which was, or should have been, ample to maintain him in magnificent style. In 1878, he took unto himself a life partner who was well qualified to assist into bankruptcy. This was the beautiful Lady Gladys Herbert, sister of the Earl of Pembroke and daughter of Lord Herbert of Lea, better known as Sidney Herbert, an eminent British statesman. She is nearly six feet high, and of the dark Jewish type of beauty, and is known by the pet name of "La Gitana," or "the Gipsy." Some years ago, Lady Herbert, the mother of "La Gitana," and another daughter joined the Catholic Church. The tall and handsome Gitana did not follow their example, but dashed into the gay world of dance, song, and horsemanship, and met Lord Lonsdale. Both loved the world too well, and not wisely, before and after marriage. The fashionable ball-rooms of London, Paris, and Vienna, the race courses of Europe, the yachting and hunting excursions of the night and day, the season and sunshine of life, found these attractive two if not the leaders at least the chief features. The art world was ransacked for Lady Lonsdale, and a princely income brought to her mansion many a costly gem of the painter and jeweler. Her diamond bill in seven months was said to have been $100,000, and her upholstery and bric-a-brac invoices were double that sum. To this menu the noble earl added sundry and divers, such as twenty-two blooded race horses, various improvements on three country estates, and a large steam yacht, the Northumbria. The marriage was the lady's own choice, being against the wish of her family, and her brother refused to attend her wedding on account of Lord Lonsdale's habitual intemperance and spendthrift habits. In two months Lady Gladys had to return to her mother, and her husband committed the disgraceful act of announcing in the papers that he would not be responsible for her bills. But there was something besides the size of the bills behind the scandal, the name of a notorious young rake, a Yorkshire baronet, who recently married an American wife, being unpleasantly coupled with Lady Lonsdale's.

An account of a queen's drawing room a year or two ago gave the following description of Lady Lonsdale's appearance thereat: "Her dress is said to have cost 100 guineas, and it quite looked as if it had. It was of the richest white satin, the petticoat being completely covered with the most exquisitely painted groups of flowers, which were repeated at intervals upon the train. The diamonds were indescribably magnificent, and on one side of her corsage was fastened a black pearl of fabulous size, set round with brilliants. From the shoulder straps, which served as sleeves, hung strings of pearls, a novel and beautiful arrangement. Her loveliness is the dark Jewish type—she is called the 'Gypsy'—and really, when enhanced by these magnificent adornments, she looked like some gorgeous vision of oriental royalty summoned from the pages of Disraeli's own glowing fiction. The premier paid her marked attention at the drawing room."

All this racket, as bachelor and married man, was more than even the princely income of the Lowther estates could stand, and by 1879 Lord Lonsdale enjoyed the distinction of being practically a bankrupt, as well as a libertine and drunkard. So hard pressed was he, indeed, that in the spring of that year, he auctioned off all the china and bric-a-brac in his possession that was not strictly entailed. All things considered, his death will not be a great loss to the English peerage.

NORTHWESTERN DAIRYMEN.

Officers of the Association—Preparations to Fight Unjust Claims.

The sixteenth annual convention of the Northwestern Dairymen's association was held last week at Geneva Lake, Wis., After the annual adress by President Hoard of Fort Atkinson, a considerable amount of routine business was transacted, and then began the presentation of papers, followed by dicussion of the subjects treated upon. The most interesting and important papers read were those by C. C. Buell, of Rock Falls, Ill., upon The Advantages of the Cream Gathering System, and Ensilage and Silos, by E. J. Oatman of Dundee, Ill. The offices elected were as follows: President, W. D. Hoard of Fort Atkinson; vice presidents, Hiram Smith, Sheboygan Falls, Wis.; Judge Burchard, Marshall, Minn.; R. F. Riddell, Chicago; C. C. Buell, Rock Falls, Ill.; G. Bales, Genoa, Ill.; O. R. Beach, Whitewater, Wis.; Col. R. M. Littler, Davenport, Io.; C. Street, Hebron, Ill.; Geo. C. Lawrence, J. S. Lumbard, A. H. Barber, Chicago; D. Curtiss, Fort Atkinson, Wis.; secretary, R. P. McGlincy, Elgin; treasurer, D. G. Cheever, Beloit, Wis.

The following resolution was introduced by Mr. Hiram Smith and was adopted:

Whereas, Parties are prosecuting dairymen in the Northwest for rights on reissued patents, on claims we believe to be unjust; and

Whereas, There are two organizations now making efforts to defend suits brought, or to be brought, to collect such claims, namely: the Wisconsin Dairymen's Protective association and the Northwestern Protective association; therefore,

Resolved, That all efforts be merged in the Wisconsin association, and the four vacancies in the board of directors be supplied, three from the board of trade of Elgin and from the Jefferson board of trade and that when the board of directors is full, as allowed by the laws of the Wisconsin Protective agency, that they be fully authorized to act independently or co-operatively with other organizations as they deem desirable.

A number of interesting papers pertaining to dairying were read and dicussed.

A Woman's Infatuation.

From the San Francisco Chronicle.

The rashness of the young woman who married Gottung, the murderer, sentenced to state prison for ten years, has been the talk of the town for two days. It seems that her parents, who are in comfortable circumstances and have a pleasant home, used every means to break her infatuation for the murderer, but without effect. Finally her father forbade her to come home, and she engaged a poor little room on Powell street, where she is now living. She had adopted the little daughter of the murderer, who calls her "mamma." She spent Sunday in jail, seeming to take great delight in kissing and hugging the brutal-looking German before the crowd which was assembled in the prison corridor. She didn't seem disconcerted at furnishing a free show in osculation. The father of the girl, when interviewed, said that he should take no steps to annul the marriage or interfere in any manner. "It is a sad affair," he said, "and it is all over as far as I am concerned. She is married and that is all there is to it. I can't help it." Mr. Wilson indicated that he had done with his daughter forever. Gottung, the newly-made bridegroom, smiled on the reporter in prison, and said: "The last four months have been the pleasantest of my life. The next ten years of my life will be happier than the last with my first wife. My wife and I have all our prospects arranged. She can visit me now without any one having the right to say a word against her. She supports herself, and we've made all arrangements for her comfort. My wife will look after my little girl, whom she has had with her three months. Our marriage is legal. Somebody will have to interfere to annul it, and who is going to do so? Even if they do, they will only put us to the trouble of getting married over again when I get out." Gottung said that, with credits, he expected to get out of prison in six and one half years. Public comment is severe on the brother and other relatives of Gottung, who favored the marriage, and on the justice of the peace who performed the ceremony.

The Floating Homes of Bangkok.

Henry A. Ward in the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

Boats are the universal means of conveyance and communication, and a boat thus becomes a necessary adjunct of every person's household; to its dexterous use every child is trained; men, women and children are equally accustomed. Perhaps the most common form is a stout skiff about twenty-five feet long, turning up very shapely and high behind, like a Venetian gondola. It is broad in the beam, and two thirds of its length is housed over, leaving a little flat deck in front, and a still smaller one behind. Behind stands the husband and sculls; in front stands the wife, rowing and using a boat-hook to help their way through the crowds. The front of the boat is used for business, passengers or cargo. The rear third is given up to family and domestic furniture.

For, incredible as it may seem, we soon see that each boat is the home of a family—father, mother, girls and boys; who are born there, live there and die there. In the day time the children and the furniture are crowded into a space not over four feet squarer, at night they can spread out over greater surface. I looked into these homes with attention and never could enough wonder or admire how closely all was packed without seeming to jostle or painfully crowd. Also that the children lived so happily and contentedly in a space no larger than a large-sized Saratoga trunk! It is probably a fact that there are many ten-year-old children in Bangkok river who have never walked over twenty feet in a straight line, in short, who have never been on land. But then, when they come in proximity to boats whose little inmates they knew, they would—boys and girls from five to twelve—jump out of their boat-house, and dive and swim away to visit and gambol around together; now free in the water, now hanging to the boat's side or sitting astride of the scull oar. And a friend tells me that he has seen them in their visits take with them a baby, to whose shoulders mother has prudently attached a hollow gourd or other light gourd to insure its safety.

In a minor excursion up a side canal I found myself at the city residence of the prime minister—whose name I have not now time to write out in full. I ran my boat all around through his pleasure grounds, and wondered whether the worthy old gentleman considered that he was living on land or in the river. In one part of his aquatic elysium I saw magnificent specimens of the victoria regia, whose leaves, round like a platter, were over two yards in diameter. Their rim was sharply turned up in a ledge an inch high, and on the raft thus formed were settled, quite at home like, a family of frogs. They too, seemed to fall in with the humors of the country.

IN SOLITARY CONFINEMENT.

The Story of a Prisoner Who Was Shut Up Nine Years.

Taking the pencil he drew a rough sketch of the interior of the prison.

"The guard who stands in the center there can see everything that's going on down every one of the galleries. Every one of those double marks is for a gallery with cells along each side and a man with a loaded gun at each end. They keep twenty-four bloodhounds all the time in one of the halls. Every one of the halls runs into the center circle. So a man has no chance. You can't find out how the place is fixed when going, because you've got your head all tied up in the black cap. I got more accustomed to it after I had been there a year or so, but it was terrible not to have any one to talk to and to go on from day to day in the same cell. It breaks the best men down. The brain goes first. It always affects the brain. When a man is broken down so that he will die in a little while if something is not done for him, they take him to the hospital and let him stay there until he gets strong enough to stand it a while longer. I worked at the trade of bottoming chairs; some of them make shoes and some cigars. They are glad to work at anything when they have to be shut up by themselves. There is no talking allowed; no whistling; no unnecessary noise of any kind. If the rules are violated two guards come into the cell; they drag you out; you have to hold your hands above your head. They catch you by the shoulders and throw you down. Then they beat you with their back jacks. They are clubs with ropes to them. There is no beating allowed but they do it any how. Then you are put in the 'cooler.' It is the deepest dungeon in the place, with scarcely any light in it. You get exactly three ounces of bread a day, and a quart of water while you are there, and you stay twenty-one days. 'Is that the only punishment?' No, they have a tight box they put you in. It has water in it which strikes you just under the arm pits, and there is more water running in all the time. You have to pump with your hands and feet as hard as you can to keep the water from getting over your head. I have seen men who were left until they were broken down and were nearly drowned. I 'ducked' twice. That's what they call it.

"I was buried for nine years, and I nearly forgot how to talk. My throat and tongue got so I couldn't use them. When all but my last year was up they let me out of my cell to carry water to the other prisoners. I had a wife and child when I went in. One day in 1876 the keeper and another man came to my cell. They read me a notice that my wife had married again. Before they got through, the keeper looked at me and stopped. He pulled the other man away. 'Stop,' said he, 'he's hurt enough.' He was right, but I lived through it. Every day the keeper would come, open the trap in the door of my cell, put in my food, talk to me for a minute or two and go away. It was the same thing for ten years, day after day. The grand jury would come into the prison occasionally and before they came everything would be fixed up. But they didn't see anything. We could count time that day. Once, every month, too, we got a bath. At last the day came for me to get out. It was December 24 last, the day before Christmas. They took me to the door and told me to go. I stepped out and the fresh air struck me. I trembled like a leaf. A bootblack was standing across the street. He saw me coming and said 'Welcome out.' I had hard work to keep from crying. I wandered around the city hunting work. I was resolved to die sooner than go back."—St. Louis Republican.

Miss Barry, an eight-year-old daughter of a prominent citizen of Germantown, Pa., died on the 25th from hydrophobia, after twenty-six hours of most intense suffering. She was bitten about six months ago by a pet dog, but no attention was paid to it until the evening before, when she became speechless and was seized with violent spasms, barking and snarling in a vicious manner at those around her bedside.

Ending of the Episcopal Convention

The general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Philadelphia, after a session of twenty-one days closed on Friday 26th. After prayer and singing, the pastoral letter was read by Rt. Rev. Bishop Huntington. After speaking cheerfully of the church, the letter says:

PASTORAL LETTER.

We had better confess on the score of theological education, in ample libraries, in strong endowments, in multiplying branches of research, in even pace with the best students abroad, we have no boasts to make before one if not two or three of Christian bodies working and worshipping at our side, in fact nothing at all worthy of our superior heritage and traditions, under the same double law, permanence and movement, the church finds the motive and joy of her missionary action. "As the father hath sent me, so I send you." Foreign missions, home missions, missions to men of any tongue or color are but the unfolding and spreading of the power of one incarnate life that is universal, and so must our missionaries be. There is no difference between Jew and Gentile humanity, dead or dying in sin, always the foreign land. All souls covenanted with the church are at home with our elder brother, and the convention's never-ceasing unprecedented reports, evangelizing toil, stirred our hearts. Strong voices told us of bold enterprises, so vast that our weak faith hardly knows whether they must arouse or discourage us, that have been exposed all over the earth in twenty years and never more conspicuously than since our last triennial meeting. This church has been awakened to increased practical sympathy with the weaker and suffering classes victims of social wrong, unequal laws, intemperance in drink and unscrupulous traffic in them and sometimes of merciless wealth.

The letter treats of emigration and says: In the action of this commission, taking measures to provide Christian care for the immense number of European emigrants daily arriving at our seaports and lakeports and distributed over the continent, there is pointed out a line of usefulness peculiar to our condition, open to the clergy and laity alike.

The bishops next take up the question of the desecration of the marriage vow and handle it roughly. Public schools are also referred to and great care in their administration is advocated. Continuing the letter he says:

Thinking and studying men, who are also believers, are everywhere looking for grounds of Christian unity, and it is the glorious hope of our time. We hold that the vantage ground is with us, because experience, Christ's words, and right and reason affirm together that unity must appear if we will by growth form historic roll, not by construction or wedding of platforms. Recently, as a fit prelude to broader affiliations of friendship between the mother church and ourselves has been made more vital and more conscious than ever before, not only by welcome visits of beloved brethren of the English bench to our council and homes.

The letter ends in a triumphant reference to the success of the church, spiritually and financially. Gloria in Excelsis was sung, the dictor benediction pronounced by Bishop Lee, and the convention adjourned sine die.

The year which is drawing to an end has been replete with evidence of divine goodness. Bouncing a Famous Female Lawyer.

Upon reports of the commissioner of pensions the secretary of the interior has suspended from practice before the department Mrs. Belva A. Lockwood and E. H. Gelston & Co., pension attorneys of Washington. Mrs Lockwood is accused of receiving illegal fees and withholding pension money, and Gelston & Co., of filing fraudulent claims. Belva Lockwood, the female lawyer, who has been suspended by Secretary Teller for alleged irregularities in pension cases, was in the department a few days ago and made it warm for Mr. Teller, who told her kindly but firmly that he could not discuss the matter with her, but she could apply for a hearing, prepare her evidence to answer the charges, and be heard in the regular way. This did not suit her, and she left in high dudgeon, saying she would pillory the secretary through the press. She was furious, but the secretary withstood the fusilade with the coolness of a veteran. Belva thought better of the matter later in the day, and returned and filed the application in due form. The suspended swindlers are laying the blame for all their troubles to the press. They say that the correspondents are down on them, and have taken a mean advantage of them to ruin their business. Col. Corkhill has been overwhelmed with fraudulent circulars sent to him by ex-soldiers who have received them.

Guiteau's Walking Ghost.

Washington, Special:—Warden Crocker, of the District jail, says he is not yet free from the Guiteau business. Often some cranky prisoner in the jail declares he saw Guiteau in a vision, and a night or two ago a prisoner confined in an adjoining corridor of the same wing in which the famous assassin was caged, created a commotion in the jail at midnight by shouting that he had just seen Guiteau. He could not be induced to think he was deluded by a temporary abberation of mind, but maintains that Guiteau came into his cell and stood there for some time, so frightening the occupant that he was speechless awhile. He still sticks to the story, but the jail authorities say that he is only one of the many cranks who have become temporarily insane in the jail by brooding over the crime and punishment of the assassin.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

THE SUPREME COURT'S DECREE.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25.—The following are points of the decision of the supreme court in civil rights cases. After quoting the first and second sections of the act, Justice Bradley, who delivered the opinion, says:

Has congress the constitutional power to make such a law? Of course, no one will contend that the power to pass it was contained in the constitution before the adoption of the last three amendments. Power is sought first in the fourteenth amendment. The first section, which is the one relied on, after declaring who shall be citizens of the United States and several States, is prohibitory in its character, and prohibitory upon States. It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. The individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or which injures them in life, liberty or property, without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the laws. It not only does this, but in order that the national will thus declared may not be a mere brutum fulmen, the last section of the amendment invests congress with power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. To enforce prohibition by appropriate legislation for correcting acts prohibited by State laws and State acts, and thus render them effectually null, void and inoccuous—this is the legislative power conferred upon congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation, but to provide modes of relief against State legislation or State action of the kind referred to. Until some State law has been passed, or some State action, through its officers or agents, been taken adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment no legislation of the United States under the said amendment nor any proceeding under such legislation can be called into activity by a prohibitory amendment against State laws and acts done under State authority. Inspection of the law here in question shows that it applies equally to cases arising in States, which have just such laws respecting the personal rights of citizens, and whose authorities are now ready to enforce such laws as to those which arise, in a State that may have violated the prohibitions attached. In other words it steps into the domain of local jurisprudence and lays down rules for the conduct of individuals, in society toward each other, and imposes sanctions for without referring in any manner to any supposed action of the State or its authorities. If this legislation is appropriate for enforcing the prohibition amendment, is it difficult to see where it is to stop? Why may not congress with an equal show of authority enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of life, liberty and property? If it is not supposable that States may deprive persons of life, liberty, and property without due process of law, and if the amendment itself does so suppose, should not congress proceed at once to prescribe due process of law for the protection of every one of these rights in every possible case, as well as to prescribe equal privileges in inns, public conveyances and theaters? Judge Bradley refers to the civil rights bill of April 4, 1866, and shows it is clearly corrective in its character, intended to counteract and furnish redress against State laws and proceedings and customs having the force of law, which sanction the wrongful acts specified. "In this connection," he adds, "it is proper to state that civil rights such as are guaranteed by the constitution against State aggression, cannot be impaired by the wrongful acts of individuals unsupported by State authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings. The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong, or a crime of that individual—an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property or his reputation; but if not sanctioned in some way by the State, or not done under its authority, his rights remain in full force and may personally be vindicated by resorts to the laws of the State for redress. An individual cannot deprive a man of his right to vote, to hold property, to buy and sell, to sue in the courts, or to be a witness or juror. He may, by force or fraud, interfere with the enjoyment of rights in a particular case. He may commit an assault against a person or commit murder, or use ruffianly violence at him, or slander the good name of a fellow citizen; but unless protected in these wrongful acts by some shield of State law or State authority, he cannot destroy or injure the right. He will only render himself amenable to satisfaction or punishment and amenable, therefore, to the laws of the State where wrongful acts are committed. If the principles of interpretation we have laid down are correct, as we deem them to be, it is clear that the law in question would be sustained by any grant, legislative power or congress, or by the fourteenth amendment; but to adopt direct and primary is distinguished from corrective legislation on the subject in hand, as sought in the second place from the thirteenth amendment, which amendment abolished slavery and gives congress power to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation. This amendment, as well as the fourteenth, is undoubtedly self-executing, without any auxiliary legislation, so far as its terms are applicable to any existing state of circumstances. By its own unaided force and effect it abolished slavery and

THE ENFORCEMENT OF THOSE RULES

ESTABLISHED UNIVERSAL FREEDOM.

Still, legislation may be necessary and proper to admit all the various cases and circumstances to be affected by it and to prescribe proper measures of redress for its violation in letter or spirit, and such legislation may be primary and direct in its character, for the amendment is not a mere prohibition of State laws establishing or upholding slavery, but an absolute declaration that slavery or involuntary servitude, shall not exist in any part of the United States. Now, conceding for the sake of argument that admission in a public conveyance to any place of public amusement, on equal terms with all other citizens is the right of every man and all classes of men, is it any more than one of these rights, which the States by the Fourteenth amendment are forbidden to deny to any person? And is the constitution violated until a denial of the right has the same States' sanction or authority? Can the act of a mere individual owner of a public conveyance, or of a place of amusement, refusing accommodation, be justly regarded as imposing any badge of slavery or servitude upon the applicant, or only as an action for ordinary civil inquiry if properly cognizable by the laws of the States and presumably subject to redress by their laws till the contrary appears? After giving to these questions all the consideration which their importance demands, we are forced to the conclusion that such an act of refusal has nothing to do with slavery or involuntary servitude; that, if it is a violation of any right of the party, his redress is to be sought under the laws of the State; or, if those laws are adverse to his right and do not protect him, his remedy will be found in the corrective legislation which congress has adopted, or may adopt, for counteracting the effect of State laws or State

A FEMALE HUSBAND.

A Most Remarkable Revelation—A Runaway Wife Marries a Girl and They Live as Man and Wife for Months.

WAUPUN, Wis., Special Telegram, Oct. 29.—Late this evening there was a denoument here which, when it becomes known, will cause a genuine social sensation, not only here but at Belvidere, Ill. Some months ago the wife of S. J. Hudson of the latter city mysteriously disappeared, deserting her husband and two children. Mr. Hudson searched long and vainly for his truant wife, and it was only a few days ago that he obtained a clue which brought him to this city and resulted to-night in the extraordinary discovery that she had not only been masquerading in male attire since she fled from her home in Belvidere, but had actually won the affections of a young woman living here, and had married her. The name of the latter is Gertrude Fuller. The wedding took place late last spring at the residence of the bride's mother, Rev. H. L. Morrison officiating, and a number of friends being present. Mr. Hudson had assumed the name of Frank Dubois. The newly and strangely wedded pair immediately took up their abode together, earning a living by painting and by other odd bits of work such as were offered them. Their "wedded" life, which came to an abrupt termination when the injured husband suddenly presented himself to-night at their modest abode, has, to all appearances, been a happy one, and "Frank Dubois" and his wife have, so far as the general public or their own acquaintances could judge, lived in the most complete contentment. There have been little circumstances now and then which appeared to be somewhat charms to the gaze of a densely thronged ball-room to the utter disgust of all refined ladies, and gentlemen as well. At the last hop a young naval officer, well known in society circles, who was introduced to and waltzed with one of the semi-nude young ladies, was soon after approached by a friend, who inquired how he had enjoyed the waltz. His reply was: "Oh, pretty well, considering Miss——'s dress was cut so infernally low, and exposed so much of her person that I became distracted, and therefore could not enjoy the dance as I should have otherwise." When gentlemen have occasion (and this one was certainly justified in his remarks) to allude to ladies, or rather would-be ladies, in such a manner, and within the hearing of a score or more, it is high time the committees having these hops in hand give some attention to reform in the matter of ladies' dress, or else politely request those who persist in making so public an exhibition of themselves to remain away." This is very strong language. The communication, as may be imagined, raised a row.

The Charm of Fiction.

From Chamber's Journal.

Literary preferences, like love preferences are unexplainable. We like because we like. Macauley's biographer says of him that the days on which he detected, in the dark recesses of a Holborn bookstall, some trumpery romance that had been in the Cambridge circulating library in the year 1820, was a date marked with a white stone in this calender. He exulted over the discovery of a wretched novel called "Conscience," which he owned to be execrable, as triumphantly as if it had been a first folio edition of Shakspeare with an inch and a half of margin. "Why is it?" he asks in his diary, "that I can read twenty times over the trash of——, and that I cannot read Bulwer's work? It is odd, but of all writers of fiction who possess any talent at all, Bulwer, with very distinguished talent, amuses the least." Bulwer, however, conquered him once, for he sets down: "On my journey through the Pontine Marshes I finished Bulwer's 'Alice.' it affected me much, and in a way which I have not been affected by novels these many years. Indeed, I generally avoid all novels which are said to have much pathos. The sufferings which they produce is to me a very real suffering, and of that I have quite enough without them." Theodore Hook relished nothing better with his wine than novels of a serious cast, and was so fond of "Gil Blas" that he made a point of reading it every year. He would cross-examine Sir Henry Holland's children in the most minute details respecting Sir Charles Grandison and Miss Byron, and could have done the same with regard to the "Pride and Prejudice" series, of which he said there were no compositions in the world approaching so near to perfection—a eulogium Whately and Whewell would have readily indorsed.

LATE MARKET REPORT.

ST. PAUL.

WHEAT—The market is steady and featureless. The feeling which has prevailed for some time past has not been weakened through long waiting, and possibly received some slight strengthening from Saturday's reports from the outside markets. Wheat men are generally of the opinion that wheat will go no lower this season, and that if an export demand should spring up there would be an immediate and marked rise in prices, accompanied by an active movement of the grain now being held back by the farmers. The board quotations are the same as on Saturday, viz.: $1.01 bid for spot, October and November No. 1 hard; $1.02 bid for December, and $1.05 bid for May. No. 1 92c bid; No. 2 hard, 96c bid; No. 2, 87c bid. Two cars of wheat were sold by sample at 98c. The board of directors held a meeting at the close of the board session, and agreed to recommend the resolution establishing grades for frozen wheat.

FLOUR—The week opens with a steady market for flour, and no visible prospect of an immediate change in tone. Fair Eastern orders were received by the millers yesterday, and the local trade exhibited considerable activity. Quotations are unchanged, ranging as follows: Patents, Orange Blossom, $6.75; Red Cross, straights, $6; Capitol, family, $5.50; Bakers, XXXX, $4 50; in barrels, 25c extra; outside brands, 25@50c per bbl, according to quantity; low grades, $2@2.50. Rye flour, $3 75 per bbl. Graham, $4.50 per bbl. Buckwheat flour, $10 per bbl.

CORN—Corn continues steady and in good demand. For spot and November No. 2 mixed 46c was bid and 48c asked; year, 46c bid and 47c asked; May, 47½c bid and 48c asked. For No. 3 45c was bid and 47c asked. A bid for rejected was made at 42c. A sale was recorded of one car, No. 2, May delivery, at 47½c.

OATS—The market is unchanged. Board quotations: No. 2 mixed, spot, 27½c bid; November delivery, 28c bid and 29½c asked; December, 28c bid and 29½c asked; May, 32c bid and 33c asked. For No. 2 white 29c was bid; No. 3 white, 27½c bid. One car No. 2 white was sold at 30c, and 1 car No. 3 at 28c.

MINNEAPOLIS.

WHEAT—The market was quite active yesterday, and there was a very fair amount of trading done. Samples were picked up with avidity, and sellers as a rule went home cleaned out. Prices were ½c higher for No. 1 hard, and about the same on other grades. Northern wheat was in good demand, and 93c was offered for 10,000 bu November delivery, but holders asked 96c. Transactions were mostly confined to samples, although there were sales of No. 2 hard at 98c: No. 1 regular at 96c; No. 1 Northern at 93c; No. 1 regular, 92c, with transit; and rejected, by sample, at 82c. The best bid for No. 1 hard, November delivery, was $1.02, and $1.02¾ was asked. Holders wanted 91c for

BECKER COUNTY POLITICS.

Communicated.

RICHWOOD, Oct. 26th, 1883.

ED. JOURNAL.—Every man on the ticket, nominated at the Regular Republican County Convention in Detroit is a good one and a vote for that ticket is a check to the reckless Bank Ring at Detroit; a saving to the county farmers and the most desirable thing to the taxpayers of Becker County. Richwood is solid for the straight Republican ticket.

YOURS, FARMER

AUDUBON, Oct. 30th, 1883.

The political pot in this county is boiling. The struggle between the regulars and half breeds is going fiercely on. The county convention that nominated the regular Republican ticket was conducted in a fair and honorable manner, not a single town being contested, although it was well known that the delegates from Richwood were bogus, elected at a meeting held without notice, which was "large and respectable," there being two persons present, Jim Campbell being the "large" and Rumery the "respectable." The expense was $10, which was paid to the said Rumery by the Bank of Detroit. Five of the representatives from Lake Park were represented by John, of the Bank of Lake Park and brother-in-la of the Bank of Detroit, whose howl, together with that of the aforesaid large and respectable delegation from Richwood was unanimous for "anything to beat Torgerson and the regular ticket" Brother-in-la John's failure to get there brought down upon him the anathamas of brother-in-la Holmes, of the Bank of Detroit, who declared that the said John hadn't brains enough to handle the western part of the county as he ought to have done, for heretofore the Bank of Detroit had run the county, and now, with the assistance of the Brevet Bank at Lake Park expected to get away with Knute Nelson, Paul Sletten, and the rest of the "Norwegian Cattle," as Holmes calls them. But the most singular part of it is that the average voter don't seem to see the true inwardness of the fight, which, on the part of the half-breeds, is plunder and pelf, that ticket being manipulated by Holmes, Phinney and Chapin, conceded as fairly representing the world, the flesh and the devil, the trio who heretofore plundered the town of Detroit when, as supervisors, they let road contracts, buying in town orders for 40 cents on the dollar which they immediately converted into cash at par from funds of the town which they controlled. Phinney makes his boast that he never voted the Republican ticket in his life; and he is to-day putting out Frazee's money for the benefit of himself and the rest of the Democratic ticket, i. e. ten dollars for himself and one for Frazee. Phinney early displayed a faculty for holding a paying office, and would take anything in sight. If all reports are true, before lighting out for the west, his proclivities were so strong in this direction that he took something which a policeman or Sheriff made him drop. His theology is the same as Holmes'. He is down on any one who keeps the Sabbath, but thinks it right for him to "keep" anything he can get his grip on. They find him a handy man to have in the house as a Darwinian missing link between the half-breeds and Democrats. Chapin, as county commissioner, was not satisfactory to them. He couldn't get his digits deep enough into the county funds. He did, however, work up the poor farm deal in fine style. Sherman, from whom the place was bought, repeatedly offered it for $3,000. The county paid, through Chapin and the Bank of Detroit, $4,000. Where the surplus $1,000 went to may be an open question to some, but not to those who know the parties to the transaction. We don't think to-day Chapin is a dollar ahead on that deal, as he also runs a bank (stud horse poker) and in a quiet little seance of the above mentioned game Banker Holmes "busted" Banker Chapin and scooped the entire proceeds of that swindle; but the tax-payers have got to foot the bills. As usual the community, especially his milk customers, were the sufferers, as the milk from his cows for a long time thereafter appeared to be heavily diluted, small fish being found in the same, which, according to Chapin's explanation must have been imbibed by his cows while drinking at the river and miraculously escaped though the teats.

Holmes is posing for county commissioner so that he can control the county funds, with the object (well known to the initiated) of selling his hotel at Detroit (on which he is badly stuck) for the county building for $40,000, which cost him about $10,000, and by the support of the gudgeons of Detroit and Erie, he may succeed. How he manages to deceive what is known as the moral element of the community is a mystery. An avowed infidel, he refuses to make the necessary papers to perfect the title to church property in Detroit which his pal, Bowman, is attempting to steal and which theft Holmes has the power to prevent, but will not. It is well known that he, with abusive and profane language, declined to contribute towards the erection of the Catholic church in Detroit, and yet if he and his friend Phinney are elected it will be by Catholic votes.

Let us take a closer view of the half breed ticket. A. H. Wilcox, candidate for Auditor, who pledged himself squarely to Mr. Hunt, and says to-day that he proposes to vote for him. (because he promised to) yet for some unaccountable reason consents to have his honorable name and record stultified and disgraced at the behest of Holmes and Phinney, reminding us of a transaction that occurred 1,800 years ago when the best man who ever lived was crucified between two thieves.

O. A. Boe, candidate for County Treasurer, a chronic office seeker who last year pledged himself for Nelson and voted for Kindred. The regulars don't want him, and the half-breeds have already sold him out. Requiescat in pace.

Stacy J. Offord, half-breed candidate for County Attorney—who is he? He is well posted in law (of a certain kind) his law library consisting of a well read edition of Hoyle, and Schenck on draw poker, and a history of England contained in a back gammon board in two volumes. He is a worthy assistant to Banker Chapin and, if elected, at least one other man's wife would certainly be well pleased at the result.

Judge (God save the mark) W. W. Rossman, with Democratic proclivities (for whiskey) is also a candidate for County Attorney, but he is simply fishing for a fee, his price for withdrawal being $50. Offord has offered him $5, but we understand they are about effecting a compromise at $2.75.

Hamilton is doing good service for [illegible] election of the half-breeds, experience having shown that the political support of the Detroit Record will insure the defeat of any man. Hamilton means well enough, but he has the post office bee in his bonnet and has a sort of forelorn hope that he may get there, but he never will.

It is hard telling how the "Kernel" stands in this controversy, but we think we can prove it when we say that he has "buried the hatchet" with Holmes and is playing the old sly fox and wouldn't be averse to Holmes' selling his hotel for a county building, it not being generally known that he is considerably more interested in real estate in that vicinity than appears on the surface.

Holy Moses! have you read the intensely sour grape article in the last issue of the Detroit Record? Think of the double dyed hypocracy of Hamilton in attacking Dixon; the boss act! From Hamilton's advent into Detroit till now he has willingly worn the collar of E G. Holmes and sneezes every time Holmes takes snuff. He doubtless thinks that a "fair exchange" (of bosses) is no robbery, but in this case the public would differ from him, as whatever may be said of Sletten, he never fleeced the public, and if we must have bosses any one is infinitely preferable to Hamilton's boss—the redoubtable C. S. Holmes.

The voters of the county should understand that the half-breed ticket means the Bank of Detroit.

For Auditor, A. H. Wilcox, who don't want it, but, if elected, will retire from the office and appoint Al. Brooks, bank clerk his deputy—in the interest of the bank.

For Sheriff, J. H. Phinney, owned by the bank. They must hang together or hang separately.

For County Commissioner, E. G. Holmes, cashier of said bank and custodian of the county funds. He has a hotel to sell for a county building.

For County Attorney, Stacy J. Offord who, if elected, will yield his place to Lawyer J. T. Brown, attorney at and for said bank, by appointing the said Brown his deputy.

Citizens of Becker County, how do you like this ticket? Don't be deceived by it, but vote the straight Republican ticket and elect men to office those who are unpledged or untrammelled, and who will do their whole duty without fear, favor or hope of reward.

YOURS, X.

DETROIT, Minn., Oct. 23, 1882.

EDITOR JOURNAL: The county convention for Becker County was held in Detroit on the 6th inst., which nominated a full ticket of good, honest Republicans, thus leaving the ring candidates out in the cold. This so enraged the tricksters that they have resolved to defeat the ticket if money, bad whiskey and develish lying will do it. This ring is composed of Democrats and mongrels, half Democrat and half Republican, who make politics a trade, and are straining every nerve to carry Becker County this fall, and, if successful, will have it for sale next year to the highest bidder in the Congressional race. This same ring controlled Detroit at the time the $5,000 road bonds were issued and hundreds of dollars of the people's money was pocketed by these same men. How much of the $25,000 that the people of Becker County are asked to vote for erecting county buildings will go into these same pockets if the ring keeps control of the county treasury for the next two years; who can tell? The Record man tells us that the people of the county are very much dissatisfied with the ticket nominated by the convention. If so, how is it that so much hard work is being done to defeat the regular nominees? It is all bosh, Mr. Record, the only ones who are dissatisfied are the scalaways who are trying to set a trap to catch Kindred's barrel next fall, and who will doubtless vote for Bierman and Frazee this fall. The men who sold Bodkin last year after inducing him to run for Senator must go.

J. M.

LAKE PARK, Becker Co., Oct. 25, 1883.

ED POLK COUNTY JOURNAL:

As you are doubtless aware, politics in Becker County are as you might say "red-hot." In all that I have seen in our county paper, the Record, from Lake Park, one might be led to suppose that Lake Park was a nonentity in the body politic of Becker Co.; but judging from the lively manner in which the emissaries of the Ring have been about here laboring in the interests of the Ring and the anti-convention ticket you would suppose that E. G. Holmes & Co., are very much interested in the welfare of the people of Lake Park and vicinity at least so far as votes are concerned. But, Mr. Editor, the straight Republican ticket, as nominated by the good old party in a straight convention is good enough for the honest people of Lake Park and vicinity so far as my observation goes and I have been about among 'em a good bit. The people are fearful to trust the false promises of the old Ring, made only when they wish to get votes and made only to be broken. They ask us to vote for E. G. Holmes for County Commissioner telling us that we ought to because Holmes pays LARGE TAXES! So-o-o? How long since? We supposed that his property was all covered by being in another's name. He must have made much wealth in Becker County to be able to assume the responsibility of the control of his large property interests by paying taxes in his own name. They come up here and tell us to vote for Phinney! Why should we? What has he ever done to entitle him to further honors more than he has already enjoyed? Give us Norcross; a fearless, straight-forward Republican who is not afraid to arrest the biggest desperado that ever walked and who does not go sneaking around the county begging alms of its citizens in the shape of votes. The Ring asks us to vote for S. J. Offord County Attorney. Why should we do that while in the regular nominee, Mr O. L. Larson we have a man far more capable? A man whom the Ring never controlled and never can. The Ring asks to vote for Boe for Treasurer and that settles it. Mr. Boe's history in this county is too well known to need further discussion, and I think where he is BEST KNOWN he will receive least votes. The Ring asks us to vote for A. H. Wilcox for Auditor, but before we consent to do that we must ask him a few questions. Mr. Wilcox, stand up! Did you, while you were appraiser of lands for the N. P. Railroad Company, receiving pay from that company as a trusted agent, work solely in their interests or did you manage it so that O. F. Kindred received the benefit of your surveys to gobble up sundry valuable tracts of land belonging by right to the Railroad Company? Will you explain [illegible] Frazee? Also will you explain your State Land transactions with E. G. Holmes and reconcile both to honesty and uprightness? How about that affidavit that you are accused of having made out and giving to Ole A. Boe to peddle about the county in Kindred's interests? How is it that you are now a candidate for Auditor anyhow, after you have repeatedly asserted that nothing could induce you to accept the office again when your present term expires? Has boss Holmes put the thumb screws to you and obliged you to run so that you can resign and appoint one of his tools? How comes it that you are now asking for votes when you have pledged yourself to vote and work for Mr. C. S. Hunt whom you have also highly recommended to others? How is it that you are now supporting Ole A. Boe, a man whom you have frequently denounced in unmeasured terms as an unmitigated scoundrel, fraud and a defaulter! Mr. Wilcox, before you go further in your requests for the votes of the honest men of this county please answer these few questions to the entire satisfaction of those honest men whose votes you seek and then you can sit down. Until you can do so do not be surprised if honest men refuse to vote for you. Well, Mr. Editor, my Lake Park notes have spun out to quite a length and my subject is not half exhausted. I could go on all night and then only make a fair beginning upon the frauds of this old Ring that has so long been a canker-sore upon the body politic, but I forbear. Lake Park and vicinity is in line and we shall cast a big vote for the straight Republican State and County ticket or I greatly miss my guess.

Respectfully yours, ALECK.

JUST BEFORE THE BATTLE.

Before another issue of the JOURNAL greets its readers the great battle will have been fought and the victory won. That it will be a Republican victory the advices from the several States who will cast their votes next Tuesday assures us beyond a doubt, but the great care of every Republican should be to render it as complete as possible by voting himself and by making sure that his neighbor votes also. In view of its effect upon the great struggle that will take place next year every Republican vote should be cast next Tuesday and the victory thus rendered overwhelming. It is more important that every Republican should vote and that he should cast his vote for the straight Republican ticket than many suppose, as upon this coming Gubernatorial vote is to be fixed the basis of our representation for the important election of 1884. The JOURNAL will not have another opportunity during this campaign to urge upon its readers the importance of a solid Republican vote, so we may be excused if we seem importunate. TURN OUT, see that your neighbor turns out and put in one good solid day's work for your country and the good old Republican party, and it will be a day well put in, a day that no true-blue Republican need be ashamed in future years to look back upon. Remember that your foe is wary and unceasing in his labors. If the matter does not seem to be of so much importance, just consider the fact that the Democratic party is straining every nerve to get a foothold and failing in that, will be satisfied if they succeed in making any inroads upon our good old Republican majority, and they should be met at the polls by the solid phalanx of the whole Republican vote of the State and by bitter disappointment when those votes are counted. The grand young State of Minnesota can roll up a bigger vote this fall than ever before, and she will if every Republican will but do his simple duty. Once more, rally at the polls on Tuesday next and show the United States an example worthy of emulation.

A Long Range Candidate.

The Chronicle publishes a card from Thos C Shapleigh the present incumbent in the office of Clerk of the Court in which Mr. Shapleigh says that he is not a candidate for re-election at the coming election but reserves the right to become one at the next election, which he fixes for November 1886

WHEAT RAISING.

The lesson which farmers should heed, taught by this fall's experience.

That the experience of the past summer has shown the necessity of thorough cultivation we think no sane man will doubt and many have taken heed thereto and are making arrangements to leave about one-third their land in cultivation for summer-fallowing next year, and the fall plowing now being done is being done far better and deeper than ever before. It has been shown that the land deepest plowed resisted the drouth far better than that plowed shallow. We could cite many instances but one will do. Mr. M. R. Brown plowed his land to the depth of seven inches and the result was that his wheat was in the stack some two weeks earlier than his neighbors and was threshed early in September and came out in splendid condition. The drouth delayed the most of the wheat at least two weeks and when at last it was ready to ripen the weather was too cool, causing it to ripen very slowly and in spots with the result that the frost caught some of it and some had to be cut before it was quite ready thus causing some damage. This gave the Millers a chance to steal another grade and they were not slow to avail themselves of the oppartunity. We do not believe that one-quarter of the so-called "frozen wheat" is affected by the frost at all (except as far as the price is concerned) but the fact that there was any that was furnished the pretext for a steal that the farmer must suffer for. There is no good reason why, with proper cultivation every acre in wheat should not have been out of the reach of all harm by frost, and we trust that our farmers will heed the severe lesson they have this fall received and pay more earnest attention to proper cultivation. This great wheat monopoly will not last forever for if an open market is not given us on this railroad the day is not far distant when we shall have direct communication with eastern markets via Duluth and then there must be an open market. Meanwhile let every farmer instead of becoming discouraged by the lessons of the past take courage and hope, and by due diligence and proper cultivation raise a grade and quality of wheat that shall sustain the reputation of this great Red River Valley for the best wheat in the world. Our Scotch Fife wheat is actually worth twenty-five cents a bushel more than common wheats and with [illegible] nearer its worth than we have this fall. That day is coming and not far hence! Let us therefore take courage and try the effects of thorough cultivation on the good old Scotch Fife.

Draining Interests.

Grand Forks Plaindealer.

In Looking over the map of Polk County, showing where the lands have been drained and graded, it is a noticeable fact that the people of that county have interested themselves a great deal in this matter. In some towns of the county a grade has been thrown up on nearly every section line. The town of Keystone leads off with the largest amount of any. In this town the Keystone Farming Company have located and are doing a great deal to develop the resources of that part of Polk County. They own and run a New Era Grader and Ditcher, and the township also uses one. The Keystone Company have all their cultivated lands ditched, and the crops they have raised are so much better that the expense has been met by the additional product per acre over ditched lands and those that have not been drained. It is in Keystone township that the great Manitoba ditch begins, and into which a great deal of the water of that town is drained. The lands in and around Keystone township are what are known as the lowlands of the Red River Valley. They have long been regarded as too wet and low for cultivation. The New Era has dawned upon the world, and the low lands of the Red River become the most valuable of the northwest. They are low and rich, and all they need is proper draining and they produce the largest and best crops of the valley. In this whole township the people are convinced of the value of this new machine, and are determined to profit by its use. The settlers here belong to that go-ahead class of farmers who appreciate the benefits of good highways in all parts of their town, and know that when they see what good is being done are willing to do a little more and secure a still greater benefit. The problem of the low lands of the Red River Valley is solved. The people of the Red River Valley know a good thing and it will not be long before every township in the valley will be using a New Era Grader, which is the best machine ever invented for the valley, where the best grain is grown in the land of No. 1 hard.

Pioneer Press: How to raise hard wheat where before none but soft wheat would grow is a problem worth spending money on. It is of more value to Minnesota and Dakota than almost any other thing that can be named. If our scientists and the richly endowed colleges of agriculture are able to solve it they will have justified a good deal of expense upon them. The product of the limited territory that, under unaided natural conditions, can give us hard wheat is too small. Already English millers are canvassing a plan to combine and send buyers to Manitoba to buy hard wheat, which they find is necessary to have in order to endure the competition of American millers. And this occurs after the most careful experiments have been made in Great Britain to improve the varieties of wheat raised there, and increase their yield. In the current number of the Popular Science Monthly a review of what has been done in this direction is given. The conclusion reached from a long series of trials with various seeds is that the simplest way to secure improvement is by keeping up the standard in any variety by the selection of the largest and most perfect kernels, from which, under separate culture and the most favoring care, to grow wheat for seed. In short, the claim made by the scientist is that the hap-hazard method of taking seed wheat out of the whole crop is disastrous in the long run. Every poor kernel reproduces in kind, and the percentage of increase is beyond calculation. To check this, the culture of seed wheat should be with every farmer a matter requiring special care. Seed wheat should be grown separately, and protected as far as possible from any circumstance likely to cause deterioration. To start with, it is found true that the largest ear of wheat contains the finest kernels. These in a series of years will, if grown separately and under the best of care, not only maintain their individual size, but will increase the number of kernels in the ear. These results of skillful cultivation present a course for Minnesota [illegible] tomary one. It is a salutary thing that farmers have any faith at all in the renewal of the quality of their products from time to time. That they do, is encouragement for the hope that before many years it will be as much the farmer's pride to raise his seed wheat under separate and specially favoring conditions as it will to boast of a large yield. There seems to be very little to learn about methods. They can be gained by experience as easily as any other way. The essential thing is to make use of that little that may be learned. Should the farmers of Southern Minnesota, who are beginning to look upon wheat as one of the lost crops, attend diligently to the matter of seed wheat culture, there can be little doubt that the area of the hard wheat crop would be soon extended considerably from its present confines.

An Independent Outlet.

From the Grand Forks Herald

The recent attempt of the Miller's Association to break down the price and reputation of Dakota No. 1 hard, leads us to reflect upon the undesirability of remaining at the mercy of a monopoly such as exists throughout this Territory. Upon the strength of an absurd report the buyers throughout the Territory straightway refuse to the farmers the proper grading of their grain, and by so doing cheat the farmer out of a certain percentage of the legitimate reward of his enterprise, labor and investment. The farmer may be keenly sensible of the injustice done him, but as the railway monopoly stands in with the milling monopoly, he is perfectly helpless in the premises, and is compelled to endure it as philosophically as he can. There is no question that every producer in Dakota is compelled to make two profits upon his industry, the larger one of which goes directly into the coffers of the railway company, which gives him nothing whatever in return, and if our farmers are enabled to thrive and grow wealthy with this odious embargo upon their industry, the fact is solely due to the superior fertility of the soil and their own efforts. We are not of those who urge a frantic war against railroads, without reason or justice. We recognize fully what the capital and enterprise of our railway system, selfish though their motive be, and largely as they have been reimbursed, have done to promote settlement and open up the Territory of Dakota for production. But it is a truism that corporations have no souls, and companies of capitalists are conscienceless. So long as monopoly endures they will charge the last cent the farmer is able to bear, and live, and the only hope of relief it and must be in competition. What our country wants is an independent outlet to navigation at Duluth, and to obtain this should be the chief aim and object of our public policy. One scheme, which bade fair to open this highway to prosperity to the people of Dakota, is now locked up in litigation the result of the jealous opposition of the existing monopoly. What our interests require is either that this scheme shall be released and vigorously prosecuted, or that a new enterprise be instituted to carry out the object of the Duluth & Winnipeg railway. We make no doubt that if a proper organization were had of a company, independent from the control or influence of any existing railway combinations, and embodying in its charter proper protection of the public interests, every county, town and township from here to Duluth, and many in the Grand Forks district not immediately on the line of the railway, but which would be benefitted thereby, would contribute liberally in bonuses to secure the construction of such an undertaking. What is wanted is an understanding between Duluth, Grand Forks, and the principal intermediate points, to set the work properly in motion. Once set properly on foot its success, both as a factor in our progress and prosperity, is assured.

Monopolizing the Grain Business.

St. Paul Globe: State Railway Commissioner Gen. J. H. Baker left the city last evening for Little Falls on matters connected with the excitement recently caused there, and now at boiling heat, by the Northern Pacific railroad refusing to provide cars for the Little Falls dealers for shipment of grain from private warehouses, and to make rates for such carriage, while furnishing all the cars needed for the shipment of grain from the road's own elevators. This complaint, with the private shippers is not only raging in Little Falls, but all along the main points on the line in Minnesota and from Verndale, Glyndon, and other towns complaints have come rolling in to Commissioner Baker on this railroad elevator grain monopoly subject very rapidly all through this week. From the fire in the eye of the Commissioner just before setting out on his elevator errand we think that there is some legislative enactment on this subject which he intends to bring to bear on the Northern Pacific to bring them down from their [illegible]
